PREFACE.

In presenting this volume to the public, we wish to sketch briefly the history of its compilation. This we believe due to the many who so earnestly co-operated with us in the work.

The PIONEER SOCIETY appointed a Historical Committee to confer with publishers, relative to compiling and publishing the History of Washtenaw County. This committee consisted of three members, Dr. Thomas Holmes, Horace Carpenter and Samuel G. Ives, all gentlemen of undoubted ability, and in whom the people of the county have the greatest confidence. During the early part of 1880 several conferences were held by this committee with publishers, but no definite arrangements made. In the month of September of that year, after an examination of our style and plan of historical publications, as well as of numerous testimonials, by the committee, we made a satisfactory agreement with it, and immediately entered upon the labor of writing and compiling the History of Washtenaw County.

To insure as great accuracy as possible in the work, the President of the PIONEER SOCIETY, according to instructions from the society, appointed three additional members to the Historical Committee, for the revision and correction of the manuscript of the general history; and a committee was appointed for each township, to revise and correct the histories of their respective townships. A similar committee was also appointed for the cities of Ann Arbor and Ypsilanti. Thus there were twenty-three committees, consisting of seventy-two men, to insure, so far as was practical, to the people a full and correct work. Great care was taken in the appointment of these committees, and the wisdom of the selections made proved itself; for, with but few exceptions, each committeeman came forward and did his duty nobly. They were men of ability, who earnestly desired a true and faithful record of their county to be made; and for this labor of love posterity will owe them a debt of gratitude which it can never repay.

When these committees were appointed, we promised to submit the manuscript to them, giving them liberty to make all changes, additions and corrections they deemed necessary. Thus the great responsibility of having the work full and accurate was taken from our shoulders and vested in them. As evidence that we faithfully fulfilled the promise made to the PIONEER SOCIETY, that we would submit the manuscript, and that each of the committees performed its duty, we publish on the following pages certificates signed by the various committees, which were signed by each of the committee, to that effect. The labor of revision, although tedious, was pleasant, the greatest harmony prevailing between the committees and ourselves. Not once did we ever hesitate to make the change ordered or follow their suggestions.

We extend to the members of these committees the thanks of grateful hearts for the material aid received from them in our labor of compilation, and for the studious care with which they examined the prepared manuscript.

While we believe there never was a local history published where such a united effort was made to insure accuracy, as with the present volume, yet errors will be found in its pages. It is a physical impossibility to write a book of such magnitude, where so many thousands of facts are related, and tens of thousands of names and dates given, and have it free from mistakes. We believe, however, that this book is practically correct, even in detail.

We cannot lay down our pen without returning deep thanks to the PIONEER SOCIETY, as well as making personal reference to some of these, who aided us so materially in the preparation of this work—men whose kindness we can never forget. First among them we will mention LORENZO DAVIS, HORACE CARPENTER, DR. THOMAS HOLMES, GEN. EDWARD CLARK, JUDGE CHAUNCEY JOSLIN, JOHN Q. A. SESSIONS, JOHN GEDDES, F. S. FINLEY, J. W. WING, WILLIAM M. GREGORY, the County Clerk, EVERETT B. CLARK, and the Register of Deeds, ERASTUS N. GILBERT. There are hundreds to whom we feel grateful, and who deserve personal mention for the kind assistance given us, but want of space alone prevents this offering.

We desire to tender our thanks to PROF. ALEXANDER WINCHELL for the very able chapter on Geology, and GOV. ALPHEUS FELCH for the article on the Courts of the County, and PROF. ADAMS for the history of the University of Michigan. To PROF. ADOLPH COVERT, who prepared the chapter on Ornithology, and MISS E. C. ALLMENDINGER, who wrote that on Botany, we beg to offer our acknowledgments.

The newspaper Press, realizing the importance of local history, displayed a rare unanimity in supporting the work. During the period of our stay in the county the editors of the various journals were always ready to co-operate with us, and to the aid thus afforded is due much of the completeness which marks the chapters of this volume. Therefore to them we desire to tender thanks.

We will not forget the hundreds who made the publication of this book a possibility. To these, who so liberally subscribed for it, and for whom this work was compiled, we shall ever feel grateful; nor can we close this preface without an expression of thanks to our historians for the assiduity and faithfulness with which they labored. Especially does S. J. Clarke deserve our thanks for the very great care manifested in preparing the general history of the county, as also does M. A. Leeson for editing the histories of the townships and cities.

We feel that our duties have been fully, faithfully and impartially discharged all our promises fulfilled, and the laborer's pay earned. With a full consciousness of all this we present the History of Washtenaw County to our subscribers.

CERTIFICATES.

The Pioneer Society, at their December meeting, 1880, passed a resolution instructing the President of the society to appoint three additional members to the Historical Committee, to form a committee to revise and correct the general history of the county; and revisory committees, from each township, to revise and correct the histories of their respective townships.

Below we give a copy of the certificate signed by this committee, showing that we complied with our promises to submit the manuscript, and also that its members performed their duties. We also give a copy of the certificates signed by the township committees. These certificates are all worded alike. We therefore deem it unnecessary to subscribe each of them in full, but give the names of the signatory members. These certificates will also show to those who examine this work that great care was taken to have it authentic and reliable.

We, the undersigned, members of the General Committee appointed by the President of the Pioneer Society of Washtenaw county, to correct and revise the manuscript of the History of Washtenaw county, written and compiled by Chas. C. Chapman & Co. of Chicago, Ill., do hereby certify that we had free access to said manuscript, at any and all times, and that we did to the best of our ability follow the instructions given us. We examined said manuscript, and made all the changes and additions that we, in our judgment, deemed necessary.

HISTORY OF MICHIGAN.

Michigan! If you seek a pleasant peninsula, look around you, in Michigan. Every visitor at St. Paul's church, London, is overawed with the magnificence of that structure, the work of Sir Christopher Wren. He wants to know where the remains of Wren are now; in the crypt of the church they lie, where the following is engraved upon the headstone: Si monumentum requiris, circumspice,—If you seek a monument [of Wren], look around [and behold the work of his brain in this mighty building]. The State of Michigan has appropriately adopted for her motto this expression, with a slight alteration, thus: Si quæris peninsulam amœnam, circumspice,—If you seek a pleasant peninsula, look around you. And indeed Michigan may as justly feel proud of its resources as Great Britain, of St. Paul's church,—yea, and infinitely more. What with her substantial foundation in agriculture throughout the southern counties, in horticulture throughout the lower peninsula, and especially the fruit belt along her western boundary, in pines in the central portion of the State, and with her crown of iron and copper in the upper peninsula, tipped with silver, she stands the real queen of the utilitarian world.

It is a pleasure to write the history of such a State. Contrast this pleasant task with writing and studying the histories of States and empires which we have been taught to ponder and revere from our youth up, histories of European countries cobwebbed with intrigue, blackened with iniquity and saturated with blood. What a standing, practical reproof Michigan is to all Europe! and what a happy future she has before her, even as compared with all her sister States!

Now let's to our chosen task, and say first a few words concerning the prehistoric races, observing, by the way, that the name "Michigan" is said to be derived from the Indian Mitchi-sawg-yegan, a great lake.

MOUND-BUILDERS.

The numerous and well-authenticated accounts of antiquities found in various parts of our country clearly demonstrate that a people civilized, and even highly cultivated, occupied the broad surface of our continent before its possession by the present Indians;

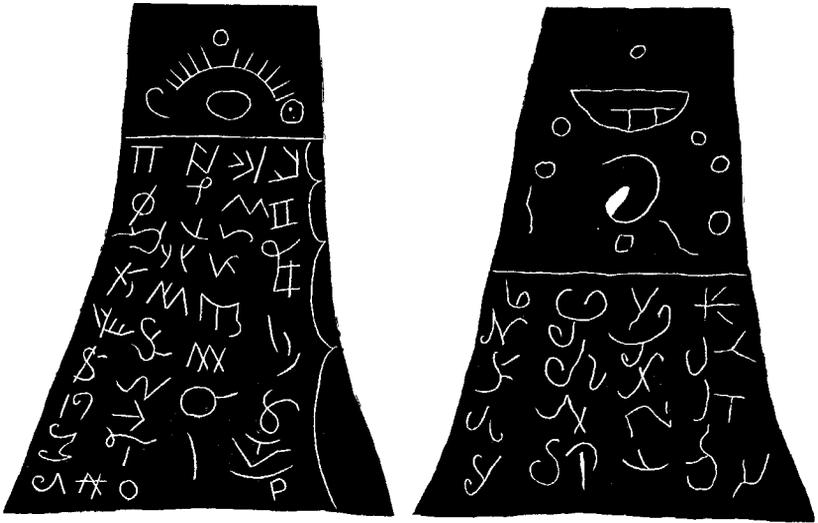

but the date of their rule of the Western World is so remote that all traces of their history, their progress and decay, lie buried in deepest obscurity. Nature, at the time the first Europeans came, had asserted her original dominion over the earth; the forests were all in their full luxuriance, the growth of many centuries; and naught existed to point out who and what they were who formerly lived, and loved, and labored, and died, on the continent of America. This pre-historic race is known as the Mound-Builders, from the numerous large mounds of earth-works left by them. The remains of the works of this people form the most interesting class of antiquities discovered in the United States. Their character can be but partially gleaned from the internal evidences and the peculiarities of the only remains left,—the mounds. They consist of remains of what were apparently villages, altars, temples, idols, cemeteries, monuments, camps, fortifications, pleasure grounds, etc., etc. Their habitations must have been tents, structures of wood, or other perishable material; otherwise their remains would be numerous. If the Mound-Builders were not the ancestors of the Indians, who were they? The oblivion which has closed over them is so complete that only conjecture can be given in answer to the question. Those who do not believe in the common parentage of mankind contend that they were an indigenous race of the Western hemisphere; others, with more plausibility, think they came from the East, and imagine they can see coincidences in the religion of the Hindoos and Southern Tartars and the supposed theology of the Mound-Builders. They were, no doubt, idolators, and it has been conjectured that the sun was the object of their adoration. The mounds were generally built in a situation affording a view of the rising sun; when enclosed in walls their gateways were toward the east; the caves in which their dead were occasionally buried always opened in the same direction; whenever a mound was partially enclosed by a semi-circular pavement, it was on the east side; when bodies were buried in graves, as was frequently the case, they were laid in a direction east and west; and, finally, medals have been found representing the sun and his rays of light.

At what period they came to this country is likewise a matter of speculation. From the comparatively rude state of the arts among them, it has been inferred that the time was very remote. Their axes were of stone. Their raiment, judging from fragments which have been discovered, consisted of the bark of trees, interwoven with feathers; and their military works were such as a people would erect who had just passed to the pastoral state of society from that dependent alone upon hunting and fishing.

The mounds and other ancient earth-works constructed by this people are far more abundant than generally supposed, from the fact that while some are quite large, the greater part of them are small and inconspicuous. Along nearly all our water courses that are large enough to be navigated with a canoe, the mounds are almost invariably found, covering the base points and headlands of the bluffs which border the narrower valleys; so that when one finds himself in such positions as to command the grandest views for river scenery, he may almost always discover that he is standing upon, or in close proximity to, some one or more of these traces of the labors of an ancient people.

The Mound-Builder was an early pioneer in Michigan. He was the first miner in the upper peninsula. How he worked we do not know, but he went deep down into the copper ore and dug and raised vast quantities, and probably transported it, but just how or where, we cannot say. The ancient mining at Isle Royale, in Lake Superior, has excited amazement. The pits are from 10 to 20 feet in diameter, from 20 to 60 feet in depth, and are scattered throughout the island. They follow the richest veins of ore. Quantities of stone hammers and mauls weighing from 10 to 30 pounds have been found, some broken from use and some in good condition. Copper chisels, knives and arrowheads have been discovered. The copper tools have been hardened by fire. Working out the ore was doubtless done by heating and pouring on water,—a very tedious process; and yet it is said that, although 200 men in their rude way could not accomplish any more work than two skilled miners at the present day, yet at one point alone on Isle Royale the labor performed exceeds that of one of the oldest mines on the south shore, operated by a large force for more than 30 years. Since these ancient pits were opened, forests have grown up and fallen, and trees 400 years old stand around them to-day.

Mounds have been discovered on the Detroit river, at the head of the St. Clair, the Black, the Rouge, on the Grand, at the foot of Lake Huron, and in many other portions of the State. Those at the head of the St. Clair were discovered by Mr. Gilman, in 1872, and are said to be very remarkable.

LARGE CITIES.

Mr. Breckenridge, who examined the antiquities of the Western country in 1817, speaking of the mounds in the American Bottom, says: "The great number and extremely large size of some of them may be regarded as furnishing, with other circumstances, evidences of their antiquity. I have sometimes been induced to think that at the period when they were constructed there was a population here as numerous as that which once animated the borders of the Nile or Euphrates, or of Mexico. The most numerous, as well as considerable, of these remains are found in precisely those parts of the country where the traces of a numerous population might be looked for, namely, from the mouth of the Ohio on the east side of the Mississippi to the Illinois river, and on the west from the St. Francis to the Missouri. I am perfectly satisfied that cities similar to those of ancient Mexico, of several hundred thousand souls, have existed in this country."

It must be admitted that whatever the uses of these mounds—whether as dwellings or burial places—these silent monuments were built, and the race who built them vanished from the face of the earth, ages before the Indians occupied the land, but their date must probably forever baffle human skill and ingenuity.

It is sometimes difficult to distinguish the places of sepulture raised by the Mound-Builders from the more modern graves of the Indians. The tombs of the former were in general larger than those of the latter, and were used as receptacles for a greater number of bodies, and contained relics of art, evincing a higher degree of civilization than that attained by the Indians. The ancient earthworks of the Mound-Builders have occasionally been appropriated as burial places by the Indians, but the skeletons of the latter may be distinguished from the osteological remains of the former by their greater stature.

What finally became of the Mound-Builders is another query which has been extensively discussed. The fact that their works extend into Mexico and Peru has induced the belief that it was their posterity that dwelt in these countries when they were first visited by the Spaniards. The Mexican and Peruvian works, with the exception of their greater magnitude, are similar. Relics common to all of them have been occasionally found, and it is believed that the religious uses which they subserved were the same. If, indeed, the Mexicans and Peruvians were the progeny of the more ancient Mound-Builders, Spanish rapacity for gold was the cause of their overthrow and final extermination.

A thousand other queries naturally arise respecting these nations which now repose under the ground, but the most searching investigation can give us only vague speculations for answers. No historian has preserved the names of their mighty chieftains, or given an account of their exploits, and even tradition is silent respecting them.

Following the Mound-Builders as inhabitants of North America, were, as it is supposed, the people who reared the magnificent cities, the ruins of which are found in Central America. This people was far more civilized and advanced in the arts than were the Mound-Builders. The cities built by them, judging from the ruins of broken columns, fallen arches and crumbling walls of temples, palaces and pyramids, which in some places for miles bestrew the ground, must have been of great extent, magnificent and very populous. When we consider the vast period of time necessary to erect such colossal structures, and, again, the time required to reduce them to their present ruined state, we can conceive something of their antiquity. These cities must have been old when many of the ancient cities of the Orient were being built.

INDIANS.

The third race inhabiting North America, distinct from the former two in every particular, is the present Indians. They were, when visited by the early discoverers, without cultivation, refinement or literature, and far behind the Mound-Builders in the knowledge of the arts. The question of their origin has long interested archæologists, and is the most difficult they have been called upon to answer. Of their predecessors the Indian tribes knew nothing; they even had no traditions respecting them. It is quite certain that they were the successors of a race which had entirely passed away ages before the discovery of the New World. One hypothesis is that the American Indians are an original race indigenous to the Western hemisphere. Those who entertain this view think their peculiarities of physical structure preclude the possibility of a common parentage with the rest of mankind. Prominent among those distinctive traits is the hair, which in the red man is round, in the white man oval, and in the black man flat.

A more common supposition, however, is that they are a derivative race, and sprang from one or more of the ancient peoples of Asia. In the absence of all authentic history, and when even tradition is wanting, any attempt to point out the particular location of their origin must prove unsatisfactory. Though the exact place of origin may never be known, yet the striking coincidents of physical organization between the Oriental type of mankind and the Indians point unmistakably to some part of Asia as the place whence they emigrated, which was originally peopled to a great extent by the children of Shem. In this connection it has been claimed that the meeting of the Europeans, Indians and Africans on the continent of America, is the fulfillment of a prophecy as recorded in Genesis ix. 27: "God shall enlarge Japheth, and he shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant."

Assuming the theory to be true that the Indian tribes are of Shemitic origin, they were met on this continent in the fifteenth century by the Japhetic race, after the two stocks had passed around the globe by directly different routes. A few years afterward the Hamitic branch of the human family was brought from the coast of Africa. During the occupancy of the continent by the three distinct races, the children of Japheth have grown and prospered, while the called and not voluntary sons of Ham have endured a servitude in the wider stretching valleys of the tents of Shem.

When Christopher Columbus had finally succeeded in demonstrating the truth of his theory, that by sailing westward from Europe land would be discovered, landing on the Island of Bermuda he supposed he had reached the East Indies. This was an error, but it led to the adoption of the name of "Indians" for the inhabitants of the island and the main land of America, by which name the red men of America have ever since been known.

Of the several great branches of North American Indians the only ones entitled to consideration in Michigan history are the Algonquins and Iroquois. At the time of the discovery of America the former occupied the Atlantic seaboard, while the home of the Iroquois was as an island in this vast area of Algonquin population. The latter great nation spread over a vast territory, and various tribes of Algonquin lineage sprung up over the country, adopting, in time, distinct tribal customs and laws. An almost continuous warfare was carried on between tribes; but later, on the entrance of the white man into their beloved homes, every foot of territory was fiercely disputed by the confederacy of many neighboring tribes. The Algonquins formed the most extensive alliance to resist the encroachment of the whites, especially the English. Such was the nature of King Philip's war. This king, with his Algonquin braves, spread terror and desolation throughout New England. With the Algonquins as the controlling spirit, a confederacy of continental proportions was the result, embracing in its alliance the tribes of every name and lineage from the Northern lakes to the gulf. Pontiac, having breathed into them his implacable hate of the English intruders, ordered the conflict to commence, and all the British colonies trembled before the desolating fury of Indian vengeance.

The "Saghinan" (spelled variously) or Saginaw country comprised most of the eastern portion of the southern peninsula indefinitely. The village of the "Hurons" was probably near Detroit. The term "Huron" is derived from the French hure, a wild boar, and was applied to this tribe of Indians on account of the bristly appearance of their hair. These Indians called themselves "Owendats," as the French spelled the name, or "Wyandots," as is the modern orthography.

MANNERS AND CUSTOMS.

The art of hunting not only supplied the Indian with food, but, like that of war, was a means of gratifying his love of distinction.

The male children, as soon as they acquired sufficient age and strength, were furnished with a bow and arrow and taught to shoot birds and other small game. Success in killing large quadrupeds required years of careful study and practice, and the art was as sedulously inculcated in the minds of the rising generation as are the elements of reading, writing and arithmetic in the common schools of civilized communities. The mazes of the forest and the dense, tall grass of the prairies were the best fields for the exercise of the hunter's skill. No feet could be impressed in the yielding soil but that the tracks were the objects of the most searching scrutiny, and revealed at a glance the animal that made them, the direction it was pursuing, and the time that had elapsed since it had passed. In a forest country he selected the valleys, because they were most frequently the resort of game. The most easily taken, perhaps, of all the animals of the chase was the deer. It is endowed with a curiosity which prompts it to stop in its flight and look back at the approaching hunter, who always avails himself of this opportunity to let fly the fatal arrow.

Their general councils were composed of the chiefs and old men. When in council, they usually sat in concentric circles around the speaker, and each individual, notwithstanding the fiery passions that rankled within, preserved an exterior as immovable as if cast in bronze. Before commencing business a person appeared with the sacred pipe, and another with fire to kindle it. After being lighted, it was first presented to heaven, secondly to the earth, thirdly to the presiding spirit, and lastly to the several councilors, each of whom took a whiff. These formalities were observed with as close exactness as State etiquette in civilized courts.

The dwellings of the Indians were of the simplest and rudest character. On some pleasant spot by the bank of a river, or near an ever-running spring, they raised their groups of wigwams, constructed of the bark of trees, and easily taken down and removed to another spot. The dwelling-places of the chiefs were sometimes more spacious, and constructed with greater care, but of the same materials. Skins taken in the chase served them for repose. Though principally dependent upon hunting and fishing, the uncertain supply from those sources led them to cultivate small patches of corn. Every family did everything necessary within itself, commerce, or an interchange of articles, being almost unknown to them. In cases of dispute and dissension, each Indian relied upon himself for retaliation. Blood for blood was the rule, and the relatives of the slain man were bound to obtain bloody revenge for his death. This principle gave rise, as a matter of course, to innumerable and bitter feuds, and wars of extermination where such were possible. War, indeed, rather than peace, was the Indian's glory and delight,—war, not conducted as in civilization, but war where individual skill, endurance, gallantry and cruelty were prime requisites. For such a purpose as revenge the Indian would make great sacrifices, and display a patience and perseverance truly heroic ; but when the excitement was over, he sank back into a listless, unoccupied, well-nigh useless savage. During the intervals of his more exciting pursuits, the Indian employed his time in decorating his person with all the refinement of paint and feathers, and in the manufacture of his arms and of canoes. These were constructed of bark, and so light that they could easily be carried on the shoulder from stream to stream. His amusements were the war-dance, athletic games, the narration of his exploits, and listening to the oratory of the chiefs; but during long periods of such existence he remained in a state of torpor, gazing listlessly upon the trees of the forests and the clouds that sailed above them; and this vacancy imprinted a habitual gravity, and even melancholy, upon his general deportment.

The main labor and drudgery of Indian communities fell upon the women. The planting, tending and gathering of the crops, making mats and baskets, carrying burdens,—in fact, all things of the kind were performed by them, thus making their condition but little better than that of slaves. Marriage was merely a matter of bargain and sale, the husband giving presents to the father of the bride. In general they had but few children. They were subjected to many and severe attacks of sickness, and at times famine and pestilence swept away whole tribes.

The Indians had not only their good “manitous,” but also their evil spirits; and the wild features of the lake scenery appears to have impressed their savage minds with superstition. They believed that all the prominent points of this wide region were created and guarded by monsters; and the images of these they sculptured on stone, painted upon the rocks, or carved upon the trees. Those who “obeyed” these supernatural beings, they thought, would after death range among flowery fields filled with the choicest game, while those who neglected their counsels would wander amid dreary solitudes, stung by gnats as large as pigeons.

EUROPEAN POSSESSION.

It is not necessary to dwell on the details of history from the discovery of America in 1492 to the settlement of Michigan in 1668, as some historians do under the head of “the history of Michigan;” for the transaction of men and councils at Quebec, New York, Boston, or London, or Paris, concerning the European possessions in America prior to 1668 did not in the least affect either man, beast or inanimate object within the present limits of the State of Michigan. Nor do we see the necessity of going back to the foundations of American institutions, simply because they are the origin of the present features of Michigan institutions and society, any more than to Greek, Latin, Christian or mediæval civilization, although all the latter also affect Michigan society.

Jacques Marquette was the first white man, according to history, to set foot upon ground within what is now the State of Michigan.

LA SALLE LANDING AT THE MOUTH OF THE ST. JOSEPH'S RIVER.

He was born of an honorable family at Laon, in the north of France, in 1637, the month not known. He was educated for the Catholic priesthood; in 1654 he joined the Jesuits, and in 1666 he was sent as a missionary to Canada; after the river St. Lawrence and the Great Lakes had been mapped out, the all-absorbing object of interest with Gov. Frontenac Talch, the "intendant," and Marquette himself was to discover and trace from the north the wonderful Mississippi that De Soto, the Spaniard, had first seen at the South in 1641. In 1668, according to Bancroft, he repaired to the Chippewa, at the Sault, to establish the mission of the St. Mary, the oldest settlement begun by Europeans within the present limits of Michigan. This was under Louis XIV., of France.

In 1669 Father Marquette established a mission at Mackinaw, then called "Michilimackinac," from an Indian word signifying "a great turtle," or from the Chippewa "nichine-maukinonk," "a place of giant fairies." Here Marquette built a chapel in 1671, and continued to teach the Indians until his death.

In 1673, in company with Louis Joliet, Father Marquette received orders from Gov. Frontenac to proceed west and explore the Mississippi, which they did, as far south as the Arkansas river.

Marquette was a scholar and a polite Christian, enthusiastic, shrewd and persevering. He won the affections of all parties, French, English and Indian. He was even a man of science, with a strong element of romance and love of natural beauty in his character. Parkman speaks of him, in characteristic epithet, as "the humble Marquette who, with clasped hands and upturned eyes, seems a figure evoked from some dim legend of mediæval saintship." In life he seems to have been looked up to with reverence by the wildest savage, by the rude frontiersman, and by the polished officer of government. Most of all the States, his name and his fame should be dear to Michigan. He died in June, 1675, and was buried with great solemnity and deep sorrow near the mouth of Pere Marquette river. The remains were afterward deposited in a vault in the middle of the chapel of St. Ignace near by; but on the breaking up of the mission at this place the Jesuits burned the chapel, and the exact site was forgotten until Sept. 3, 1877, when the vault, consisting of birch bark, was found; but the remains of the great missionary were probably stolen away by his Indian admirers soon after the abandonment of the mission.

The next settlement in point of time was made in 1679, by Robert Cavalier de La Salle, at the mouth of the St. Joseph river. He had constructed a vessel, the "Griffin," just above Niagara falls, and sailed around by the lakes to Green Bay, Wis., whence he traversed "Lac des Illinois," now Lake Michigan, by canoe to the mouth of the St. Joseph river. The "Griffin" was the first sailing vessel that ever came west of Niagara falls. La Salle erected a fort at the mouth of the St. Joseph river, which afterward was moved about 60 miles up the river, where it was still seen in Charlevoix's time, 1721. La Salle also built a fort on the Illinois river just below Peoria, and explored the region of the Illinois and Mississippi rivers.

The next, and third, Michigan post erected by authority was a second fort on the St. Joseph river, established by Du Luth, near the present Fort Gratiot, in 1686. The object of this was to intercept emissaries of the English, who were anxious to open traffic with the Mackinaw and Lake Superior nations.

The French posts in Michigan and westward left very little to be gathered by the New York traders, and they determined, as there was peace between France and England, to push forward their agencies and endeavor to deal with the western and northern Indians in their own country. The French governors not only plainly asserted the title of France, but as plainly threatened to use all requisite force to expel intruders. Anticipating correctly that the English would attempt to reach Lake Huron from the East without passing up Detroit river, Du Luth built a fort at the outlet of the lake into the St. Clair. About the same time an expedition was planned against the Senecas, and the Chevalier Tonti, commanding La Salle's forts, of St. Louis and St. Joseph of Lake Michigan, and La Durantaye, the veteran commander of Mackinaw, were employed to bring down the French and Indian auxiliaries to take part in the war. These men intercepted English expeditions into the interior to establish trade with the Northern Indians, and succeeded in cutting them off for many years.

Religious zeal for the Catholic Church and the national aggrandizement were almost or quite equally the primary and all-ruling motive of western explorations. For these two purposes expeditions were sent out and missions and military posts were established. In these enterprises Marquette, Joliet, La Salle, St. Luson and others did all that we find credited to them in history.

In 1669 or 1670, Talon, then "Intendant of New France," sent out two parties to discover a passage to the South Sea, St. Luson to Hudson's Bay and La Salle southward. On his return in 1671, St. Luson held a council of all the northern tribes at the Sault Ste. Marie, where they formed an alliance with the French.

"It is a curious fact," says Campbell, "that the public documents are usually made to exhibit the local authorities as originating everything, when the facts brought to light from other sources show that they were compelled to permit what they ostensibly directed." The expeditions sent out by Talon were at least suggested from France. The local authorities were sometimes made to do things which were not, in their judgment, the wisest.

DETROIT.

July 19, 1701, the Iroquois conveyed to King William III all their claims to land, describing their territory as "that vast tract of land or colony called Canagariarchio, beginning on the northwest side of Cadarachqui lake [Ontario], and includes all that vast tract of land lying between the great lake of Ottawawa [Huron], and the lake called by the natives Sahiquage, and by the Christians the Lake of Sweege [Oswego, for Lake Erie], and runs till it butts upon the Twichtwicks, and is bounded on the westward by the Twichtwicks by a place called Quadoge, containing in length about 800 miles and breadth 400 miles, including the country where beavers and all sorts of wild game keeps, and the place called Tjenghsaghrondie alias Fort De Tret or Wawyachtenock [Detroit], and so runs round the lake of Sweege till you come to a place called Oniadarundaquat," etc.

It was chiefly to prevent any further mischief, and to secure more effectually the French supremacy that La Motte Cadillac, who had great influence over the savages, succeeded, in 1701, after various plans urged by him had been shelved by hostile colonial intrigues, in getting permission from Count Pontchartrain to begin a settlement in Detroit. His purpose was from the beginning to make not only a military post, but also a civil establishment, for trade and agriculture. He was more or less threatened and opposed by the monopolists and by the Mackinaw missionaries, and was subjected to severe persecutions. He finally triumphed and obtained valuable privileges and the right of seigneurie. Craftsmen of all kinds were induced to settle in the town, and trade flourished. He succeeded in getting the Hurons and many of the Ottawas to leave Mackinaw and settle about "Fort Pontchartrain." This fort stood on what was formerly called the first terrace, being on the ground lying between Larned street and the river, and between Griswold and Wayne streets. Cadillac's success was so great, in spite of all opposition, that he was appointed governor of the new province of Louisiana, which had been granted to Crozat and his associates. This appointment removed him from Detroit, and immediately afterward the place was exposed to an Indian siege, instigated by English emissaries and conducted by the Mascoutins and Ontagamies, the same people who made the last war on the whites in the territory of Michigan under Black Hawk a century and a quarter later. The tribes allied to the French came in with alacrity and defeated and almost annihilated the assailants, of whom a thousand were put to death.

Unfortunately for the country, the commanders who succeeded Cadillac for many years were narrow-minded and selfish and not disposed to advance any interests beyond the lucrative traffic with the Indians in peltries. It was not until 1734 that any new grants were made to farmers. This was done by Governor-General Beauharnois, who made the grants on the very easiest terms. Skilled artisans became numerous in Detroit, and prosperity set in all around. The buildings were not of the rudest kind, but built of oak or cedar, and of smooth finish. The cedar was brought from a great distance. Before 1742 the pineries were known, and at a very early day a saw-mill was erected on St. Clair river, near Lake Huron. Before 1749 quarries were worked, especially at Stony Island. In 1763 there were several lime kilns within the present limits of Detroit, and not only stone foundations but also stone buildings, existed in the settlement. Several grist-mills existed along the river near Detroit. Agriculture was carried on profitably, and supplies were exported quite early, consisting chiefly of corn and wheat, and possibly beans and peas. Cattle, horses and swine were raised in considerable numbers; but as salt was very expensive, but little meat, if any, was packed for exportation. The salt springs near Lake St. Clair, it is true, were known, and utilized to some extent, but not to an appreciable extent. Gardening and fruit-raising were carried on more thoroughly than general farming. Apples and pears were good and abundant.

During the French and English war Detroit was the principal source of supplies to the French troops west of Lake Ontario, and it also furnished a large number of fighting men. The upper posts were not much involved in this war.

"Teuchsa Grondie," one of the many ways of spelling an old Indian name of Detroit, is rendered famous by a large and splendid poem of Levi Bishop, Esq., of that city.

During the whole of the 18th century the history of Michigan was little else than the history of Detroit, as the genius of French government was to centralize power instead of building up localities for self-government.

About 1704, or three years after the founding of Detroit, this place was attacked by the Ottawa Indians, but unsuccessfully; and again, in 1712, the Ottagamies, or Fox Indians, who were in secret alliance with the old enemies of the French, the Iroquois, attacked the village and laid siege to it. They were severely repulsed, and their chief offered a capitulation, which was refused. Considering this an insult, they became enraged and endeavored to burn up the town. Their method of firing the place was to shoot large arrows, mounted with combustible material in flame, in a track through the sky rainbow-form. The bows and arrows being very large and stout, the Indians lay with their backs on the ground, put both feet against the central portion of the inner side of the bow and pulled the strings with all the might of their hands. A ball of blazing material would thus be sent arching over nearly a quarter of a mile, which would come down perpendicularly upon the dry shingle roofs of the houses and set them on fire. But this scheme was soon checkmated by the French, who covered the remaining houses with wet skins. The Foxes were considerably disappointed at this and discouraged, but they made one more desperate attempt, failed, and retreated toward Lake St. Clair, where they again entrenched themselves. From this place, however, they were soon dislodged. After this period these Indians occupied Wisconsin for a time and made it dangerous for travelers passing through from the lakes to the Mississippi. They were the Ishmaelites of the wilderness.

In 1749 there was a fresh accession of immigrants to all the points upon the lakes, but the history of this part of the world during the most of this century is rather monotonous, business and government remaining about the same, without much improvement. The records nearly all concern Canada east of the lake region. It is true, there was almost a constant change of commandants at the posts, and there were many slight changes of administrative policy; but as no great enterprises were successfully put in operation, the events of the period have but little prominence. The northwestern territory during French rule was simply a vast ranging ground for the numerous Indian tribes, who had no ambition higher than obtaining an immediate subsistence of the crudest kind, buying arms, whisky, tobacco, blankets and jewelry by bartering for them the peltries of the chase. Like a drop in the ocean was the missionary work of the few Jesuits at the half dozen posts on the great waters. The forests were full of otter, beaver, bear, deer, grouse, quails, etc., and on the few prairies the grouse, or "prairie chickens," were abundant. Not much work was required to obtain a bare subsistence, and human nature generally is not disposed to lay up much for the future. The present material prosperity of America is really an exception to the general law of the world.

In the latter part of 1796 Winthrop Sargent went to Detroit and organized the county of Wayne, forming a part of the Indiana Territory until its division in 1805, when the Territory of Michigan was organized.

NATIONAL POLICIES.—THE GREAT FRENCH SCHEME.

Soon after the discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi by La Salle in 1682, the government of France began to encourage the policy of establishing a line of trading posts and missionary stations extending through the West from Canada to Louisiana, and this policy was maintained, with partial success, for about 75 years.

The river St. Joseph of Lake Michigan was called "the river Miamis" in 1679, in which year La Salle built a small fort on its bank, near the lake shore. The principal station of the mission for the instruction of the Miamis was established on the borders of this river. The first French post within the territory of the Miamis was at the mouth of the river Miamis, on an eminence naturally fortified on two sides by the river, and on one side by a deep ditch made by a fall of water. It was of triangular form. The missionary Hennepin gives a good description of it, as he was one of the company who built it, in 1679. Says he: "We felled the trees that were on the top of the hill; and having cleared the same from bushes for about two musket shot, we began to build a redoubt of 80 feet long and 40 feet broad, with great square pieces of timber laid one upon another, and prepared a great number of stakes of about 25 feet long to drive into the ground, to make our fort more inaccessible on the river side. We employed the whole month of November about that work, which was very hard, though we had no other food but the bears' flesh our savage killed. These beasts are very common in that place because of the great quantity of grapes they find there; but their flesh being too fat and luscious, our men began to be weary of it and desired leave to go a hunting to kill some wild goats. M. La Salle denied them that liberty, which caused some murmurs among them; and it was but unwillingly that they continued their work. This, together with the approach of winter and the apprehension that M. La Salle had that his vessel (the Griffin) was lost, made him very melancholy, though he concealed it as much as he could. We made a cabin wherein we performed divine service every Sunday, and Father Gabriel and I, who preached alternately, took care to take such texts as were suitable to our present circumstances and fit to inspire us with courage, concord and brotherly love. * * * The fort was at last perfected, and called Fort Miamis."

In 1765 the Miami nation, or confederacy, was composed of four tribes, whose total number of warriors was estimated at only 1,050 men. Of these about 250 were Twightwees, or Miamis proper, 300 Weas, or Ouiatenons, 300 Piankeshaws and 200 Shockeyes; and at this time the principal villages of the Twightwees were situated about the head of the Maumee river at and near the place where Fort Wayne now is. The larger Wea villages were near the banks of the Wabash river, in the vicinity of the Post Ouiatenon; and the Shockeyes and Piankeshaws dwelt on the banks of the Vermillion, and on the borders of the Wabash between Vincennes and Ouiatenon. Branches of the Pottawatomie, Shawnee, Delaware and Kickapoo tribes were permitted at different times to enter within the boundaries of the Miamis and reside for a while.

The wars in which France and England were engaged, from 1688 to 1697, retarded the growth of the colonies of those nations in North America, and the efforts made by France to connect Canada and the Gulf of Mexico by a chain of trading posts and colonies naturally excited the jealousy of England and gradually laid the foundation for a struggle at arms. After several stations were established elsewhere in the West, trading posts were started at the Miami villages, which stood at the head of the Maumee, at the Wea villages about Ouiatenon on the Wabash, and at the Piankeshaw villages about the present sight of Vincennes. It is probable that before the close of the year 1719 temporary trading posts were erected at the sites of Fort Wayne, Ouiatenon and Vincennes. These points were probably often visited by French fur traders prior to 1700. In the meanwhile the English people in this country commenced also to establish military posts west of the Alleghanies, and thus matters went on until they naturally culminated in a general war, which, being waged by the French and Indians combined on one side, was called "the French and Indian war." This war was terminated in 1763 by a treaty at Paris, by which France ceded to Great Britain all of North America east of the Mississippi except New Orleans and the island on which it is situated; and indeed, France had the preceding autumn, by a secret convention, ceded to Spain all the country west of that river.

In 1762, after Canada and its dependencies had been surrendered to the English, Pontiac and his partisans secretly organized a powerful confederacy in order to crush at one blow all English power in the West. This great scheme was skillfully projected and cautiously matured.

The principal act in the programme was to gain admittance into the fort at Detroit, on pretense of a friendly visit, with shortened muskets concealed under their blankets, and on a given signal suddenly break forth upon the garrison; but an inadvertent remark of an Indian woman led to a discovery of the plot, which was consequently averted. Pontiac and his warriors afterward made many attacks upon the English, some of which were successful, but the Indians were finally defeated in the general war.

BRITISH POLICY.

In 1765 the total number of French families within the limits of the Northwestern Territory did not probably exceed 600. These were in settlements about Detroit, along the river Wabash and the neighborhood of Fort Chartres on the Mississippi. Of these families, about 80 or 90 resided at Post Vincennes, 14 at Fort Ouiatenon, on the Wabash, and nine or ten at the confluence of the St. Mary and St. Joseph rivers.

The colonial policy of the British government opposed any measures which might strengthen settlements in the interior of this country, lest they become self-supporting and independent of the mother country; hence the early and rapid settlement of the Northwestern Territory was still further retarded by the short-sighted selfishness of England. That fatal policy consisted mainly in holding the land in the hands of the government and not allowing it to be subdivided and sold to settlers. But in spite of all her efforts in this direction, she constantly made just such efforts as provoked the American people to rebel, and to rebel successfully, which was within 15 years after the perfect close of the French and Indian war.

AMERICAN POLICY.

Thomas Jefferson, the shrewd statesman and wise Governor of Virginia, saw from the first that actual occupation of Western lands was the only way to keep them out of the hands of foreigners and Indians. Therefore, directly after the conquest of Vincennes by Clark, he engaged a scientific corps to proceed under an escort to the Mississippi, and ascertain by celestial observations the point on that river intersected by latitude $36^{\circ} 30'$, the southern limit of the State, and to measure its distance to the Ohio. To Gen. Clark was entrusted the conduct of the military operations in that quarter. He was instructed to select a strong position near that point and establish there a fort and garrison; thence to extend his conquest northward to the lakes, erecting forts at different points, which might serve as monuments of actual possession, besides affording protection to that portion of the country. Fort "Jefferson" was erected and garrisoned on the Mississippi a few miles above the southern limit.

The result of these operations was the addition, to the chartered limits of Virginia, of that immense region known as the "Northwestern Territory." The simple fact that such and such forts were established by the Americans in this vast region convinced the British Commissioners that we had entitled ourselves to the land. But where are those "monuments" of our power now?

ORDINANCE OF 1787.

This ordinance has a marvelous and interesting history. Considerable controversy has been indulged in as to who is entitled to the credit for framing it. This belongs, undoubtedly, to Nathan Dane; and to Rufus King and Timothy Pickering belong the credit for suggesting the proviso contained in it against slavery, and also for aids to religion and knowledge, and for assuring forever the common use, without charge, of the great national highways of the Mississippi, the St. Lawrence and their tributaries to all the citizens of the United States. To Thomas Jefferson is also due much credit, as some features of this ordinance were embraced in his ordinance of 1784. But the part taken by each in the long, laborious and eventful struggle which had so glorious a consummation in the ordinance, consecrating forever, by one imprescriptible and unchangeable monument, the very heart of our country to freedom, knowledge and union, will forever honor the names of those illustrious statesmen.

Mr. Jefferson had vainly tried to secure a system of government for the Northwestern Territory. He was an emancipationist and favored the exclusion of slavery from the Territory, but the South voted him down every time he proposed a measure of this nature. In 1787, as late as July 10, an organizing act without the anti-slavery clause was pending. This concession to the South was expected to carry it. Congress was in session in New York. On July 5, Rev. Manasseh Cutler, of Massachusetts, came into New York to lobby on the Northwestern Territory. Everything seemed to fall into his hands. Events were ripe. The state of the public credit, the growing of Southern prejudice, the basis of his mission, his personal character, all combined to complete one of those sudden and marvelous revolutions of public sentiment that once in five or ten centuries are seen to sweep over a country like the breath of the Almighty.

Cutler was a graduate of Yale. He had studied and taken degrees in the three learned professions, medicine, law, and divinity. He had published a scientific examination of the plants of New England. As a scientist in America his name stood second only to that of Franklin. He was a courtly gentleman of the old style, a man of commanding presence and of inviting face. The Southern members said they had never seen such a gentleman in the North. He came representing a Massachusetts company that desired to purchase a tract of land, now included in Ohio, for the purpose of planting a colony. It was a speculation. Government money was worth eighteen cents on the dollar. This company had collected enough to purchase 1,500,000 acres of land. Other speculators in New York made Dr. Cutler their agent, which enabled him to represent a demand for 5,500,000 acres. As this would reduce the national debt, and Jefferson's policy was to provide for the public credit, it presented a good opportunity to do something.

Massachusetts then owned the territory of Maine, which she was crowding on the market. She was opposed to opening the North-western region. This fired the zeal of Virginia. The South caught the inspiration, and all exalted Dr. Cutler. The entire South rallied around him. Massachusetts could not vote against him, because many of the constituents of her members were interested personally in the Western speculation. Thus Cutler, making friends in the South, and doubtless using all the arts of the lobby, was enabled to command the situation. True to deeper convictions, he dictated one of the most compact and finished documents of wise statesmanship that has ever adorned any human law book. He borrowed from Jefferson the term "Articles of Compact," which, preceding the federal constitution, rose into the most sacred character. He then followed very closely the constitution of Massachusetts, adopted three years before. Its most prominent points were:

1. The exclusion of slavery from the territory forever.
2. Provision for public schools, giving one township for a seminary and every section numbered 16 in each township; that is, one thirty-sixth of all the land for public schools.
3. A provision prohibiting the adoption of any constitution or the enactment of any law that should nullify pre-existing contracts.

Be it forever remembered that this compact declared that "religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall always be encouraged." Dr. Cutler planted himself on this platform and would not yield. Giving his unqualified declaration that it was that or nothing,—that unless they could make the land desirable they did not want it,—he took his horse and buggy and started for the constitutional convention at Philadelphia. On July 13, 1787, the bill was put upon its passage, and was unanimously adopted. Thus the great States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, a vast empire, were consecrated to freedom, intelligence, and morality. Thus the great heart of the nation was prepared to save the union of States, for it was this act that was the salvation of the republic and the destruction of slavery. Soon the South saw their great blunder and tried to have the compact repealed. In 1803 Congress referred it to a committee, of which John Randolph was chairman. He reported that this ordinance was a compact and opposed repeal. Thus it stood, a rock in the way of the on-rushing sea of slavery.

The "Northwestern Territory" included of course what is now the State of Indiana; and Oct 5, 1787, Maj. Gen. Arthur St. Clair was elected by Congress Governor of this territory. Upon commencing the duties of his office he was instructed to ascertain the real temper of the Indians and do all in his power to remove the causes for controversy between them and the United States, and to effect the extinguishment of Indian titles to all the land possible. The Governor took up quarters in the new settlement of Marietta, Ohio, where he immediately began the organization of the government of the territory. The first session of the General Court of the new territory was held at that place in 1788, the Judges being Samuel H. Parsons, James M. Varnum and John C. Symmes, but under the ordinance Gov. St. Clair was President of the Court. After the first session, and after the necessary laws for government were adopted, Gov. St. Clair, accompanied by the Judges, visited Kaskaskia for the purpose of organizing a civil government there. Full instructions had been sent to Maj. Hamtramck, commandant at Vincennes, to ascertain the exact feeling and temper of the Indian tribes of the Wabash. These instructions were accompanied by speeches to each of the tribes. A Frenchman named Antoine Gamelin was dispatched with these messages April 5, 1790, who visited nearly all the tribes on the Wabash, St. Joseph and St.

GEN. GEORGE ROGERS CLARK.

Mary's rivers, but was coldly received; most of the chiefs being dissatisfied with the policy of the Americans toward them, and prejudiced through English misrepresentation. Full accounts of his adventures among the tribes reached Gov. St. Clair at Kaskaskia in June, 1790. Being satisfied that there was no prospect of effecting a general peace with the Indians of Indiana, he resolved to visit Gen. Harmar at his headquarters at Fort Washington and consult with him on the means of carrying an expedition against the hostile Indians; but before leaving he intrusted Winthrop Sargent, the Secretary of the Territory, with the execution of the resolutions of Congress regarding the lands and settlers on the Wabash. He directed that officer to proceed to Vincennes, lay out a county there, establish the militia and appoint the necessary civil and military officers. Accordingly Mr. Sargent went to Vincennes and organized Camp Knox, appointed the officers, and notified the inhabitants to present their claims to lands. In establishing these claims the settlers found great difficulty, and concerning this matter the Secretary in his report to the President wrote as follows:

“Although the lands and lots which were awarded to the inhabitants appeared from very good oral testimony to belong to those persons to whom they were awarded, either by original grants, purchase or inheritance, yet there was scarcely one case in twenty where the title was complete, owing to the desultory manner in which public business had been transacted and some other unfortunate causes. The original concessions by the French and British commandants were generally made upon a small scrap of paper, which it has been customary to lodge in the notary's office, who has seldom kept any book of record, but committed the most important land concerns to loose sheets, which in process of time have come into possession of persons that have fraudulently destroyed them; or, unacquainted with their consequence, innocently lost or trifled them away. By French usage they are considered family inheritances, and often descend to women and children. In one instance, and during the government of St. Ange here, a royal notary ran off with all the public papers in his possession, as by a certificate produced to me. And I am very sorry further to observe that in the office of Mr. Le Grand, which continued from 1777 to 1787, and where should have been the vouchers for important land transactions, the records have been so falsified, and there is such gross fraud and forgery, as to invalidate all evidence and information which I might have otherwise acquired from his papers.”

Mr. Sargent says there were about 150 French families at Vincennes in 1790. The heads of all these families had been at one time vested with certain titles to a portion of the soil; and while the Secretary was busy in straightening out these claims, he received a petition signed by 80 Americans, asking for the confirmation of grants of land ceded by the Court organized by Col. John Todd under the authority of Virginia. With reference to this cause, Congress, March 3, 1791, empowered the Territorial Governor, in cases where land had been actually improved and cultivated under a supposed grant for the same, to confirm to the persons who made such improvements the lands supposed to have been granted, not, however, exceeding the quantity of 400 acres to any one person.

THE FRENCH AND INDIAN WAR.

Soon after the discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi in 1682, the government of France began to encourage the policy of establishing a line of trading posts and missionary stations extending through the West from Canada and the great lakes to Louisiana; and this policy was maintained, with partial success, for about 75 years. British power was the rival upon which the French continually kept their eye. Of course a collision of arms would result in a short time, and this commenced about 1755. In 1760 Canada, including the lake region, fell into the hands of the British. During the war occurred Braddock's defeat, the battles of Niagara, Crown Point and Lake George, and the death of brave Wolfe and Montcalm. Sept. 12, this year, Major Robert Rogers, a native of New Hampshire, a provincial officer and then at the height of his reputation, received orders from Sir Jeffrey Amherst to ascend the lakes with a detachment of rangers, and take possession, in the name of his Britannic Majesty, of Detroit, Michilimackinac, and other Western posts included in the capitulation of Montreal. He left the latter place on the following day with 200 rangers in 15 whale boats. Nov. 7 they reached the mouth of a river ("Chogage") on the southern coast of lake Erie, where they were met by Pontiac, the Indian chief, who now appears for the first time upon the pages of Michigan history. He haughtily demanded of Rogers why he should appear in his realm with his forces without his permission. The Major informed him that the English had obtained permission of Canada, and that he was on his way to Detroit to publish the fact and to restore a general peace to white men and Indians alike. The next day Pontiac signified his willingness to live at peace with the English, allowing them to remain in his country, provided they paid him due respect. He knew that French power was on the wane, and that it was to the interest of his tribes to establish an early peace with the new power. The Indians, who had collected at the mouth of Detroit, reported 400 strong, to resist the coming of the British forces, were easily influenced by Pontiac to yield the situation to Rogers. Even the French commandant at Detroit, Capt. Beletre, was in a situation similar to that of the Indians, and received the news of the defeat of the French from Major Rogers. He was indignant and incredulous, and tried to rouse the fury of his old-time friends, the Indians, but found them "faithless" in this hour of his need. He surrendered with an ill grace, amid the yells of several hundred Indian warriors. It was a source of great amazement to the Indians to see so many men surrender to so few. Nothing is more effective in gaining the respect of Indians than a display of power, and the above proceedings led them to be overawed by English prowess. They were astonished also at the forbearance of the conquerors in not killing their vanquished enemies on the spot.

This surrender of Detroit was on the 29th of November, 1760. The posts elsewhere in the lake region north and west were not reached until some time afterward. The English now thought they had the country perfectly in their own hands and that there was but little trouble ahead; but in this respect they were mistaken. The French renewed their efforts to circulate reports among the Indians that the English intended to take all their land from them, etc. The slaughter of the Monongahela, the massacre at Fort William Henry and the horrible devastation of the Western frontier, all bore witness to the fact that the French were successful in prejudicing the Indians against the British, and the latter began to have trouble at various points. The French had always been in the habit of making presents to the Indians, keeping them supplied with arms, ammunition, etc., and it was not their policy to settle upon their lands. The British, on the other hand, now supplied them with nothing, frequently insulting them when they appeared around the forts. Everything conspired to fix the Indian population in their prejudices against the British Government. Even the seeds of the American Revolution were scattered into the West and began to grow.

The first Indian chief to raise the war-whoop was probably Kiashtuta, of the Senecas, but Pontiac, of the Ottawas, was the great George Washington of all the tribes to systemize and render effectual the initial movements of the approaching storm. His home was about eight miles above Detroit, on Pechee Island, which looks out upon the waters of Lake St. Clair. He was a well-formed man, with a countenance indicating a high degree of intelligence. In 1746 he had successfully defended Detroit against the northern tribes, and it is probable he was present and assisted in the defeat of Braddock.

About the close of 1762 he called a general council of the tribes, sending out ambassadors in all directions, who with the war-belt of wampum and the tomahawk went from village to village and camp to camp, informing the sachems everywhere that war was impending, and delivering to them the message of Pontiac. They all approved the message, and April 27, 1763, a grand council was held near Detroit, when Pontiac stood forth in war paint and delivered

"the great speech of the campaign." The English were slow to perceive any dangerous conspiracy in progress, and when the blow was struck, nine out of twelve of the British posts were surprised and destroyed! Three of these were within the bounds of this State.

The first prominent event of the war was the

on the northernmost point of the southern peninsula, the site of the present city of Mackinaw. This Indian outrage was one of the most ingeniously devised and resolutely executed schemes in American history. The Chippewas (or Ojibways) appointed one of their big ball plays in the vicinity of the post, and invited and inveigled as many of the occupants as they could to the scene of play, then fell upon the unsuspecting and unguarded English in the most brutal manner. For the details of this horrible scene we are indebted to Alexander Henry, a trader at that point, who experienced several most blood-curdling escapes from death and scalping at the hands of the savages. The result of the massacre was the death of about 70 out of 90 persons. The Ottawa Indians, who occupied mainly the eastern portion of the lower peninsula, were not consulted by the Chippewas with reference to attacking Michilimackinac, and were consequently so enraged that they espoused the cause of the English, through spite; and it was through their instrumentality that Mr. Henry and some of his comrades were saved from death and conveyed east to the regions of civilization.

Of Mr. Henry's narrow escapes we give the following succinct account. Instead of attending the ball play of the Indians he spent the day writing letters to his friends, as a canoe was to leave for the East the following day. While thus engaged, he heard an Indian war cry and a noise of general confusion. Looking out of the window, he saw a crowd of Indians within the fort, that is, within the village palisade, who were cutting down and scalping every Englishman they found. He seized a fowling-piece which he had at hand, and waited a moment for the signal, the drum beat to arms. In that dreadful interval he saw several of his countrymen fall under the tomahawk and struggle between the knees of an Indian who held him in this manner to scalp him while still alive. Mr. Henry heard no signal to arms; and seeing that it was useless to undertake to resist 400 Indians, he thought only of shelter for himself. He saw many of the Canadian inhabitants of the fort calmly looking on, neither opposing the Indians nor suffering injury, and he therefore concluded he might find safety in some of their houses. He stealthily ran to one occupied by Mr. Langlade and family, who were at their windows beholding the bloody scene. Mr. L. scarcely dared to harbor him, but a Pawnee slave of the former concealed him in the garret, locked the stairway door and took away the key. In this situation Mr. Henry obtained through an aperture a view of what was going on without. He saw the dead^d scalped and mangled, the dying in writhing agony under the insatiate knife and tomahawk, and the savages drinking human blood from the hollow of their joined hands! Mr. Henry almost felt as if he were a victim himself, so intense were his sufferings. Soon the Indian fiends began to halloo, "All is finished!" At this instant Henry heard some of the Indians enter the house in which he had taken shelter. The garret was separated from the room below by only a layer of single boards, and Mr. Henry heard all that was said. As soon as the Indians entered they inquired whether there were any Englishmen in the house. Mr. Langlade replied that he could not say; they might examine for themselves. He then conducted them to the garret door. As the door was locked, a moment of time was snatched by Mr. Henry to crawl into a heap of birch-bark vessels in a dark corner; and although several Indians searched around the garret, one of them coming within arm's length of the sweating prisoner, they went out satisfied that no Englishman was there.

As Mr. Henry was passing the succeeding night in this room he could think of no possible chance of escape from the country. He was out of provisions, the nearest post was Detroit, 400 miles away, and the route thither lay through the enemy's country. The next morning he heard Indian voices below informing Mr. Langlade that they had not found an Englishman named Henry among the dead, and that they believed him to be somewhere concealed. Mrs. L., believing that the safety of the household depended on giving up the refugee to his pursuers, prevailed on her husband to lead the Indians up stairs, to the room of Mr. H. The latter was saved from instant death by one of the savages adopting him as a "brother," in the place of one lost. The Indians were all mad with liquor, however, and Mr. H. again very narrowly escaped death. An hour afterward he was taken out of the fort by an Indian indebted to him for goods, and was under the uplifted knife of the savage when he suddenly broke away from him and made back to Mr. Langlade's house, barely escaping the knife of the Indian the whole distance. The next day he, with three other prisoners, were taken in a canoe toward Lake Michigan, and at Fox Point, 18 miles distant, the Ottawas rescued the whites, through spite at the Chippewas, saying that the latter contemplated killing and eating them; but the next day they were returned to the Chippewas, as the result of some kind of agreement about the conduct of the war. He was rescued again by an old friendly Indian claiming him as a brother. The next morning he saw the dead bodies of seven whites dragged forth from the prison lodge he had just occupied. The fattest of these dead bodies was actually served up and feasted on, directly before the eyes of Mr. Henry.

Through the partiality of the Ottawas and complications of military affairs among the Indians, Mr. Henry, after severe exposures and many more thrilling escapes, was finally landed within territory occupied by whites.

GEN. ARTHUR ST. CLAIR.

For more than a year after the massacre, Michilimackinac was occupied only by wood rangers and Indians; then, after the treaty, Capt. Howard was sent with troops to take possession.

SIEGE OF DETROIT.

In the spring of 1763 Pontiac determined to take Detroit by an ingenious assault. He had his men file off their guns so that they would be short enough to conceal under their blanket clothing as they entered the fortification. A Canadian woman who went over to their village on the east side of the river to obtain some venison, saw them thus at work on their guns, and suspected they were preparing for an attack on the whites. She told her neighbors what she had seen, and one of them informed the commandant, Major Gladwyn, who at first slighted the advice, but before another day passed he had full knowledge of the plot. There is a legend that a beautiful Chippewa girl, well known to Gladwyn, divulged to him the scheme which the Indians had in view, namely, that the next day Pontiac would come to the fort with 60 of his chiefs, each armed with a gun cut short and hidden under his blanket; that Pontiac would demand a council, deliver a speech, offer a peace-belt of wampum, holding it in a reversed position as the signal for attack; that the chiefs, sitting upon the ground, would then spring up and fire upon the officers, and the Indians out in the streets would next fall upon the garrison, and kill every Englishman, but sparing all the French.

Gladwyn accordingly put the place in a state of defense as well as he could, and arranged for a quiet reception of the Indians and a sudden attack upon them when he should give a signal. At 10 o'clock, May 7, according to the girl's prediction, the Indians came, entered the fort and proceeded with the programme, but with some hesitation, as they saw their plot had been discovered. Pontiac made his speech, professing friendship for the English, etc., and without giving his signal for attack, sat down, and heard Major Gladwyn's reply, who suffered him and his men to retire unmolested. He probably feared to take them as prisoners, as war was not actually commenced. The next day Pontiac determined to try again, but was refused entrance at the gate unless he should come in alone. He turned away in a rage, and in a few minutes some of his men commenced the peculiarly Indian work of attacking an innocent household and murdering them, just beyond the range of British guns. Another squad murdered an Englishman on an island at a little distance. Pontiac did not authorize these proceedings, but retired across the river and ordered preparations to be made for taking the fort by direct assault, the headquarters of the camp to be on "Bloody run" west of the river. Meanwhile the garrison was kept in readiness for any outbreak. The very next day Pontiac, having received reinforcements from the Chippewas of Saginaw Bay, commenced the attack, but was repulsed; no deaths upon either side. Gladwyn sent ambassadors to arrange for peace, but Pontiac, although professing to be willing in a general way to conclude peace, would not agree to any particular proposition. A number of Canadians visited the fort and warned the commandant to evacuate, as 1,500 or more Indians would storm the place in an hour; and soon afterward a Canadian came with a summons from Pontiac, demanding Gladwyn to surrender the post at once, and promising that, in case of compliance, he and his men would be allowed to go on board their vessels unmolested, leaving their arms and effects behind. To both these advices Major Gladwyn gave a flat refusal.

Only three weeks' provisions were within the fort, and the garrison was in a deplorable condition. A few Canadians, however, from across the river, sent some provisions occasionally, by night. Had it not been for this timely assistance, the garrison would doubtless have had to abandon the fort. The Indians themselves soon began to suffer from hunger, as they had not prepared for a long siege; but Pontiac, after some maraudings upon the French settlers had been made, issued "promises to pay" on birch bark, with which he pacified the residents. He subsequently redeemed all these notes. About the end of July Capt. Dalzell arrived from Niagara with re-enforcements and provisions, and persuaded Gladwyn to undertake an aggressive movement against Pontiac. Dalzell was detailed for the purpose of attacking the camp at Parent's creek, a mile and a half away, but being delayed a day, Pontiac learned of his movements and prepared his men to contest his march. On the next morning, July 31, before day-break, Dalzell went out with 250 men, but was repulsed with a loss of 59 killed and wounded, while the Indians lost less than half that number. Parent's creek was afterward known as "Bloody run."

Shortly afterward, the schooner "Gladwyn," on its return from Niagara with ammunition and provisions, anchored about nine miles below Detroit for the night, when in the darkness about 300 Indians in canoes came quietly upon the vessel and very nearly succeeded in taking it. Slaughter proceeded vigorously until the mate gave orders to his men to blow up the schooner, when the Indians, understanding the design, fled precipitately, plunging into the water and swimming ashore. This desperate command saved the crew, and the schooner succeeded in reaching the post with the much needed supply of provisions.

By this time, September, most of the tribes around Detroit were disposed to sue for peace. A truce being obtained, Gladwyn laid in provisions for the winter, while Pontiac retired with his chiefs to the Maumee country, only to prepare for a resumption of war the next spring. He or his allies the next season carried on a petty warfare until in August, when the garrison, now worn out and reduced, were relieved by fresh troops, Major Bradstreet commanding. Pontiac retired to the Maumee again, still to stir up hate against the British. Meanwhile the Indians near Detroit, scarcely comprehending what they were doing, were induced by Bradstreet to declare themselves subjects of Great Britain. An embassy sent to Pontiac induced him also to cease belligerent operations against the British.

In 1769 the great chief and warrior, Pontiac, was killed in Illinois by a Kaskaskia Indian, for a barrel of whisky offered by an Englishman named Williamson.

The British at Detroit now changed their policy somewhat, and endeavored to conciliate the Indians, paying them for land and encouraging French settlements in the vicinity. This encouragement was exhibited, in part, in showing some partiality to French customs.

At this time the fur trade was considerably revived, the principal point of shipment being the Grand Portage of Lake Superior. The charter boundaries of the two companies, the Hudson's Bay and the Northwest, not having been very well defined, the employes of the respective companies often came into conflict. Lord Selkirk, the head of the former company, ended the difficulty by uniting the stock of both companies. An attempt was also made to mine and ship copper, but the project was found too expensive.

AMERICAN REVOLUTION.

By this important struggle the territory of the present State of Michigan was but little affected, the posts of Detroit and Mackinaw being the principal points whence the British operated among the Indians to prejudice them against the "Americans," going so far as to pay a reward for scalps, which the savages of course hesitated not to take from defenseless inhabitants. The expeditions made by the Indians for this purpose were even supported sometimes by the regular troops and local militia. One of these joint expeditions, commanded by Capt. Byrd, set out from Detroit to attack Louisville, Ky. It proceeded in boats as far as it could ascend the Maumee, and thence crossed to the Ohio river, on which stream Ruddle's Station was situated, which surrendered at once, without fighting, under the promise of being protected from the Indians; but this promise was broken and all the prisoners massacred.

Another expedition, under Gov. Hamilton, the commandant at Detroit, started out in 1778, and appeared at Vincennes, Ind., with a force of 30 regulars, 50 French volunteers and about 400 Indians. At this fort the garrison consisted only of Capt. Helm and one soldier, named Henry. Seeing the troops at a distance, they loaded a cannon, which they placed in the open gateway; and Capt. Helm stood by the cannon with a lighted match. When Hamilton with his army approached within hailing distance, Helm called out with a loud voice, "Halt!" This show of resistance made Hamilton stop and demand a surrender of the garrison. "No man," exclaimed Helm, with an oath, "enters here until I know the terms." Hamilton replied, "You shall have the honors of war." Helm thereupon surrendered the fort, and the whole garrison, consisting of the two already named (!), marched out and received the customary marks of respect for their brave defense. Hamilton was soon afterward made to surrender this place to Gen. George Rogers Clark, the ablest American defender in the West. The British soldiers were allowed to return to Detroit; but their commander, who was known to have been active in instigating Indian barbarities, was put in irons and sent to Virginia as a prisoner of war.

The English at Detroit suspected that a certain settlement of pious Moravian missionaries on the Muskingum river were aiding the American cause, and they called a conference at Niagara and urged the Iroquois to break up the Indian congregation which had collected under these missionaries; but the Iroquois declined to concern themselves so deeply in white men's quarrels, and sent a message to the Chippewas and Ottawas, requesting them to "make soup" of the Indian congregation on the Muskingum.

These Moravian missionaries came to Detroit in 1781, before De Peyster, the commandant. A war council was held, and the council-house completely filled with Indians. Capt. Pike, an Indian chief, addressed the assembly and told the commandant that the English might fight the Americans if they chose; it was their cause, not his; that they had raised a quarrel among themselves, and it was their business to fight it out. They had set him on the Americans as the hunter sets his dog upon the game. By the side of the British commander stood another war chief, with a stick in his hand four feet in length, strung with American scalps. This warrior followed Capt. Pike, saying: "Now, father, here is what has been done with the hatchet you gave me. I have made the use of it you ordered me to do, and found it sharp."

The events just related are specimens of what occurred at and in connection with Detroit from the close of Pontiac's war until a number of years after the establishment of American independence. When the treaty of peace was signed at Versailles in 1783, the British on the frontier reduced their aggressive policy somewhat, but they continued to occupy the lake posts until 1796, on the claim that the lake region was not designed to be included in the treaty by the commissioners, probably on account of their ignorance of the geography of the region. Meanwhile the Indians extensively organized for depredation upon the Americans, and continued to harass them at every point.

During this period Alex. McKenzie, an agent of the British government, visited Detroit, painted like an Indian, and said that he was just from the upper lakes, and that the tribes in that region were all in arms against any further immigration of Americans, and were ready to attack the infant settlements in Ohio. His statements had the desired effect; and, encouraged also by an agent from the Spanish settlements on the Mississippi, the Indians organized a great confederacy against the United States. To put this down, Gen. Harmar was first sent out by the Government, with 1,400 men; but he imprudently divided his army, and he was taken by surprise and defeated by a body of Indians under "Little Turtle." Gen. Arthur St. Clair was next sent out, with 2,000 men, and he suffered a like fate. Then Gen. Anthony Wayne was sent West with a still larger army, and on the Maumee he gained an easy victory over the Indians, within a few miles of a British post. He finally concluded a treaty with the Indians at Greenville, which broke up the whole confederacy. The British soon afterward gave up Detroit and Mackinaw.

"It was a considerable time before the Territory of Michigan, now in the possession of the United States, was improved or altered by the increase of settlements. The Canadian French continued to form the principal part of its population. The interior of the country was but little known, except by the Indians and the fur traders. The Indian title not being fully extinguished, no lands were brought into market, and consequently the settlements increased but slowly. The State of Michigan at this time constituted simply the county of Wayne in Northwest Territory. It sent one Representative to the Legislature of that Territory, which was held at Chillicothe. A court of common pleas was organized for the county, and the General Court of the whole Territory sometimes met at Detroit. No roads had as yet been constructed through the interior, nor were there any settlements except on the frontiers. The habits of the people were essentially military, and but little attention was paid to agriculture except by the French peasantry. A representation was sent to the General Assembly of the Northwest Territory at Chillicothe until 1800, when Indiana was erected into a separate Territory. Two years later Michigan was annexed to Indiana Territory; but in 1805 Michigan separated, and William Hull appointed its first Governor."—Tuttle's Hist. Mich.

The British revived the old prejudices that the Americans intended to drive the Indians out of the country, and the latter, under the lead of Tecumseh and his brother Elkwatawa, "the prophet," organized again on an extensive scale to make war upon the Americans. The great idea of Tecumseh's life was a universal confederacy of all the Indian tribes north and south to resist the invasion of the whites; and his plan was to surprise them at all their posts throughout the country and capture them by the first assault. At this time the entire white population of Michigan was about 4,800, four-fifths of whom were French and the remainder Americans. The settlements were situated on the rivers Miami and Raisin, on the Huron of Lake Erie, on the Ecorse, Rouge and Detroit rivers, on the Huron of St. Clair, on the St. Clair river and Mackinaw island. Besides, there were here and there a group of huts belonging to the French fur traders. The villages on the Maumee, the Raisin and the Huron of Lake Erie contained a population of about 1,300; the settlements at Detroit and northward had about 2,200; Mackinaw about 1,000. Detroit was garrisoned by 94 men and Mackinaw by 79.

TRAPPING.

TECUMSEH.

If one should inquire who has been the greatest Indian, the most noted, the "principal Indian" in North America since its discovery by Columbus, we would be obliged to answer, Tecumseh. For all those qualities which elevate a man far above his race; for talent, tact, skill and bravery as a warrior; for high-minded, honorable and chivalrous bearing as a man; in a word, for all those elements of greatness which place him a long way above his fellows in savage life, the name and fame of Tecumseh will go down to posterity in the West as one of the most celebrated of the aborigines of this continent,—as one who had no equal among the tribes that dwelt in the country drained by the Mississippi. Born to command himself, he used all the appliances that would stimulate the courage and nerve the valor of his followers. Always in the front rank of battle, his followers blindly followed his lead, and as his war-cry rang clear above the din and noise of the battle-field, the Shawnee warriors, as they rushed on to victory or the grave, rallied around him, foemen worthy of the steel of the most gallant commander that ever entered the lists in defense of his altar or his home.

The tribe to which Tecumseh, or Tecumtha, as some write it, belonged, was the Shawnee, or Shawanee. The tradition of the nation held that they originally came from the Gulf of Mexico; that they wended their way up the Mississippi and the Ohio, and settled at or near the present site of Shawneetown, Ill., whence they removed to the upper Wabash. In the latter place, at any rate, they were found early in the 18th century, and were known as the "bravest of the brave." This tribe has uniformly been the bitter enemy of the white man, and in every contest with our people has exhibited a degree of skill and strategy that should characterize the most dangerous foe.

Tecumseh's notoriety and that of his brother, the Prophet, mutually served to establish and strengthen each other. While the Prophet had unlimited power, spiritual and temporal, he distributed his greatness in all the departments of Indian life with a kind of fanaticism that magnetically aroused the religious and superstitious passions, not only of his own followers, but also of all the tribes in this part of the country; but Tecumseh concentrated his greatness upon the more practical and business affairs of military conquest. It is doubted whether he was really a sincere believer in the pretensions of his fanatic brother; if he did not believe in the pretentious feature of them he had the shrewdness to keep his unbelief to himself, knowing that religious fanaticism was one of the strongest impulses to reckless bravery.

During his sojourn in the Northwestern Territory, it was Tecumseh's uppermost desire of life to confederate all the Indian tribes of the country together against the whites, to maintain their choice hunting-grounds. All his public policy converged toward this single end. In his vast scheme he comprised even all the Indians in the Gulf country,—all in America west of the Alleghany mountains. He held, as a subordinate principle, that the Great Spirit had given the Indian race all these hunting-grounds to keep in common, and that no Indian or tribe could cede any portion of the land to the whites without the consent of all the tribes. Hence, in all his councils with the whites he ever maintained that the treaties were null and void.

When he met Harrison at Vincennes in council the last time, and, as he was invited by that General to take a seat with him on the platform, he hesitated; Harrison insisted, saying that it was the "wish of their Great Father, the President of the United States, that he should do so." The chief paused a moment, raised his tall and commanding form to its greatest height, surveyed the troops and crowd around him, fixed his keen eyes upon Gov. Harrison, and then turning them to the sky above, and pointing toward heaven with his sinewy arm in a manner indicative of supreme contempt for the paternity assigned him, said in clarion tones: "My father? The sun is my father, the earth is my mother, and on her bosom I will recline." He then stretched himself, with his warriors, on the green sward. The effect was electrical, and for some moments there was perfect silence.

The Governor, then, through an interpreter, told him that he understood he had some complaints to make and redress to ask, etc., and that he wished to investigate the matter and make restitution wherever it might be decided it should be done. As soon as the Governor was through with this introductory speech, the stately warrior arose, tall, athletic, manly, dignified and graceful, and with a voice at first low, but distinct and musical, commenced a reply. As he warmed up with his subject his clear tones might be heard, as if "trumpet-tongued," to the utmost limits of the assembly. The most perfect silence prevailed, except when his warriors gave their guttural assent to some eloquent recital of the red man's wrong and the white man's injustice. Tecumseh recited the wrongs which his race had suffered from the time of the massacre of the Moravian Indians to the present; said he did not know how he could ever again be the friend of the white man; that the Great Spirit had given to the Indian all the land from the Miami to the Mississippi, and from the lakes to the Ohio, as a common property to all the tribes in these borders, and that the land could not and should not be sold without the consent of all; that all the tribes on the continent formed but one nation; that if the United States would not give up the lands they had bought of the Miamis and the other tribes, those united with him were determined to annihilate those tribes; that they were determined to have no more chiefs, but in future to be governed by their warriors; that unless the whites ceased their encroachments upon Indian lands, the fate of the Indians was sealed; they had been driven from the banks of the Delaware across the Alleghanies, and their possessions on the Wabash and the Illinois were now to be taken from them; that in a few years they would not have ground enough to bury their warriors on this side of the "Father of Waters;" that all would perish, all their possessions taken from them by fraud or force, unless they stopped the progress of the white man westward; that it must be a war of races in which one or the other must perish; that their tribes had been driven toward the setting sun like a galloping horse (ne-kat a-kush-e ka-top-o-lin-to).

The Shawnee language, in which this most eminent Indian statesman spoke, excelled all other aboriginal tongues in its musical articulation; and the effect of Tecumseh's oratory on this occasion can be more easily imagined than described. Gov. Harrison, although as brave a soldier and General as any American, was overcome by this speech. He well knew Tecumseh's power and influence among all the tribes, knew his bravery, courage and determination, and knew that he meant what he said. When Tecumseh was done speaking there was a stillness throughout the assembly which was really painful; not a whisper was heard, and all eyes were turned from the speaker toward Gov. Harrison, who after a few moments came to himself, and recollecting many of the absurd statements of the great Indian orator, began a reply which was more logical, if not so eloquent. The Shawnees were attentive until Harrison's interpreter began to translate his speech to the Miamis and Pottawatomies, when Tecumseh and his warriors sprang to their feet, brandishing their war-clubs and tomahawks. "Tell him," said Tecumseh, addressing the interpreter in Shawnee, "he lies." The interpreter undertook to convey this message to the Governor in smoother language, but Tecumseh noticed the effort and remonstrated, "No, no; tell him he lies." The warriors began to grow more excited, when Secretary Gibson ordered the American troops in arms to advance. This allayed the rising storm, and as soon as Tecumseh's "He lies" was literally interpreted to the Governor, the latter told Tecumseh through the interpreter to tell Tecumseh he would hold no further council with him.

Thus the assembly was broken up, and one can hardly imagine a more exciting scene. It would constitute the finest subject for a historical painting to adorn the rotunda of the capitol. The next day Tecumseh requested another interview with the Governor, which was granted on condition that he should make an apology to the Governor for his language the day before. This he made through the interpreter. Measures for defense and protection were taken, however, lest there should be another outbreak. Two companies of militia were ordered from the country, and the one in town added to them, while the Governor and his friends went into council fully armed and prepared for any contingency. On this occasion the conduct of Tecumseh was entirely different from that of the day before. Firm and intrepid, showing not the slightest fear or alarm, surrounded with a military force four times his own, he preserved the utmost composure and equanimity. No one would have supposed that he could have been the principal actor in the thrilling scene of the previous day. He claimed that half the Americans were in sympathy with him. He also said that whites had informed him that Gov. Harrison had purchased land from the Indians without any authority from the Government; that he, Harrison, had but two years more to remain in office, and that if he, Tecumseh, could prevail upon the Indians who sold the lands not to receive their annuities for that time, and the present Governor displaced by a good man as his successor, the latter would restore to the Indians all the lands purchased from them.

The Wyandots, Kickapoos, Pottawatomies, Ottawas and the Winnebagoes, through their respective spokesmen, declared their adherence to the great Shawnee warrior and statesman. Gov. Harrison then told them that he would send Tecumseh's speech to the President of the United States and return the answer to the Indians as soon as it was received. Tecumseh then declared that he and his allies were determined that the old boundary line should continue; and that if the whites crossed it, it would be at their peril. Gov. Harrison replied that he would be equally plain with him and state that the President would never allow that the lands on the Wabash were the property of any other tribes than those who had occupied them since the white people first came to America; and as the title to the lands lately purchased was derived from those tribes by a fair purchase, he might rest assured that the right of the United States would be supported by the sword. "So be it," was the stern and haughty reply of the Shawnee chieftan, as he and his braves took leave of the Governor and wended their way in Indian file to their camping ground.

Thus ended the last conference on earth between the chivalrous Tecumseh and the hero of the battle of Tippecanoe. The bones of the first lie bleaching on the battle-field of the Thames, and those of the last in a mausoleum on the banks of the Ohio; each struggled for the mastery of his race, and each no doubt was equally honest and patriotic in his purposes. The weak yielded to the strong, the defenseless to the powerful, and the hunting-ground of the Shawnee is all occupied by his enemy.

Tecumseh, with four of his braves, immediately embarked in a birch canoe, descended the Wabash, and went on to the South to unite the tribes of that country in a general system of self-defense against the encroachment of the whites. His emblem was a disjointed snake, with the motto, "Join or die!" In union alone was strength.

Before Tecumseh left the Prophet's town at the mouth of the Tippecanoe river, on his excursion to the South, he had a definite understanding with his brother and the chieftains of the other tribes in the Wabash country, that they should preserve perfect peace with the whites until his arrangements were completed for a confederacy of the tribes on both sides of the Ohio and on the Mississippi river; but it seems that while he was in the South engaged in his work of uniting the tribes of that country some of the Northern tribes showed signs of fight and precipitated Harrison into that campaign which ended in the battle of Tippecanoe and the total route of the Indians. Tecumseh, on his return from the South, learning what had happened, was overcome with chagrin, disappointment and anger, and accused his brother of duplicity and cowardice; indeed, it is said that he never forgave him to the day of his death. A short time afterward, on the breaking out of the war of Great Britain, he joined Proctor, at Malden, with a party of his warriors, and was killed at the battle of the Thames, Oct. 5, 1813, by a Mr. Wheatty, as we are positively informed by Mr. A. J. James, now a resident of La Harpe township, Hancock county, Ill., whose father-in-law, John Pigman, of Coshocton county, Ohio, was an eye witness. Gen. Johnson has generally had the credit of killing Tecumseh.

OKEMOS.

"Old" Okemos, a nephew of Pontiac and once the chief of the Chippewas, was born at or near Knagg's Station, on the Shiawassee river, where the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railroad crosses that stream. The date is shrouded in mystery. At the time of his death he was said to be a centenarian. The earliest account we have of him is that he took the war-path in 1796. Judge Littlejohn, in his "Legends of the Northwest," introduces him to the reader in 1803. The battle of Sandusky, in which Okemos took an active part, was the great event of his life, and this it was that gave him his chieftainship and caused him to be revered by his tribe. Concerning that event he himself used to say:

"Myself and cousin, Man-a-to-corb-way, with 16 other braves enlisted under the British flag, formed a scouting or war party, left the upper Raisin, and made our rendezvous at Sandusky. One morning while lying in ambush near a road lately cut for the passage of the American army and supply wagons, we saw 20 cavalrymen approaching us. Our ambush was located on a slight ridge, with brush directly in our front. We immediately decided to attack the Americans, although they outnumbered us. Our plan was first to fire and cripple them, and then make a dash with the tomahawk. We waited until they approached so near that we could count the buttons on their coats, when firing commenced. The cavalrymen with drawn sabers immediately charged upon the Indians. The plumes upon the hats of the cavalrymen looked like a flock of a thousand pigeons just hovering for a lighting."

Okemos and his cousin fought side by side, loading and firing while dodging from one cover to another. In less than ten minutes after the firing began the sound of a bugle was heard, and casting their eyes in the direction of the sound, they saw the road and woods filled with cavalry. The small party of Indians were immediately surrounded and every man cut down. All were left for dead on the field. Okemos and his cousin both had their skulls cloven and their bodies gashed in a fearful manner. The cavalrymen, before leaving the field, in order to be sure life was extinct, would lean forward from their horses and pierce the chests of the Indians, even into their lungs. The last that Okemos remembered was that after emptying one saddle, and springing toward another soldier with clubbed rifle raised to strike, his head felt as if it were pierced with red-hot iron, and he went down from a heavy saber-cut. All knowledge ceased from this time until many moons afterward, when he found himself being nursed by the squaws of his friends, who had found him on the battle-field two or three days afterward. The squaws thought all were dead, but upon moving the bodies of Okemos and his cousin, signs of life appeared, and they were taken to a place of safety and finally restored to partial health. Okemos never afterward took part in war, this battle having satisfied him that "white man was a heap powerful."

Shortly after his recovery he solicited Col. Godfroy to intercede with Gen. Cass, and he and other chiefs made a treaty with the Americans, which was faithfully kept.

The next we hear of the old chieftain, he had settled with his tribe on the banks of the Shiawassee, near the place of his birth, where for many years, up to 1837-'8, he was engaged in the peaceful vocation of hunting, fishing and trading with the white man. About this time the small-pox broke out in his tribe, which, together with the influx of white settlers who destroyed their hunting-grounds, scattered their bands. The plaintive, soft notes of the wooing young hunter's flute, made of red alder, and the sound of the tom-tom at council fires and village feasts were heard no more along the banks of our inland streams. Okemos became a mendicant, and many a hearty meal has the old Indian received from his friends among the whites. He was five feet four inches high, lithe, wiry, active, intelligent and possessed undoubted bravery; but in conversation he hesitated and mumbled his words. Previous to the breaking up of his band in 1837-'8, his usual dress consisted of a blanket coat with belt, steel pipe, hatchet, tomahawk and a heavy, long, English hunting-knife stuck in his belt in front, with a large bone handle prominent outside the sheath. He painted his cheeks and forehead with vermilion, wore a shawl around his head turban fashion, and leggins. He died at his wigwam a few miles from Lansing, and was buried Dec. 5, 1858, at Shimnicon, an Indian settlement in Ionia county. His coffin was extremely rude, and in it were placed a pipe, tobacco, hunting-knife, bird's wings, provisions, etc. An ambrotype picture was taken of this eminent Indian in 1857, and has ever since been in the possession of O. A. Jenison at Lansing, from whom we obtain the above account.

HULL'S SURRENDER.

Now we have to record an unexplained mystery, which no historian of Michigan can omit, namely, the surrender of Detroit to the British by Gen. Hull, when his forces were not in action and were far more powerful than the enemy. He was either a coward or a traitor, or both. The commander of the British forces, Gen. Brock, triumphantly took possession of the fort, left a small garrison under Col. Proctor, and returned to the seat of his government.

In 12 days he had moved with a small army 250 miles against the enemy, effected the surrender of a strong fort and well equipped army of 2,300 effective men, and one of the Territories of the United States. Hull and the regular troops were taken to Montreal, and the militia were sent to their homes.

In the capitulation Gen. Hull also surrendered Fort Dearborn at Chicago, commanding Capt. Heald of that place to evacuate and retreat to Fort Wayne. In obedience to this order the Captain started from the fort with his forces; but no sooner were they outside the walls than they were attacked by a large force of Indians, who took them prisoners and then proceeded to massacre them, killing 38 out of the 66 soldiers, even some of the women and children, two of the former and 12 of the latter. Capt. Wells, a white man who had been brought up among the Indians, but espoused the white man's cause, was killed in the massacre.

Jan. 3, 1814, Gen. Hull appeared before a court-martial at Albany, N. Y., where Gen. Dearborn was president. The accused made no objection to the constitution and jurisdiction of this court; its sessions were protracted and every facility was given the accused to make his defense. The three charges against him were treason, cowardice and neglect of duty. Hull was finally acquitted of the high crime of treason, but he was found guilty of the other charges and sentenced to be shot; but by reason of his services in the Revolution and his advanced age the court recommended him to the mercy of the President, who approved the finding of the court but remitted the execution of the sentence and dismissed Hull from the service. The accused wrote a long defense, in which he enumerates many things too tedious to relate here. Even before he was sent to Detroit he was rather opposed to the policy of the Government toward the British of Canada; and, besides, he had been kindly treated by British officers, who helped him across the frontier. Again, the general Government was unreasonably slow to inform the General of the declaration of war which had been made against Great Britain, and very slow to forward troops and supplies. Many things can be said on both sides; but historians generally approve the judgment of the court in his case, as well as of the executive clemency of the President.

PERRY'S VICTORY.

The lake communication of Michigan with the East, having been in the hands of the British since Hull's surrender, was cut off by Com. Perry, who obtained a signal naval victory over the British on Lake Erie Sept. 10, 1813. The Commodore built his fleet at Erie, Pa., under great disadvantages. The bar at the mouth of the harbor would not permit the vessels to pass out with their armament on board. For some time after the fleet was ready to sail, the British commodore continued to hover off the harbor, well knowing it must either remain there inactive or venture out with almost a certainty of defeat. During this blockade, Com. Perry had no alternative but to ride at anchor at Erie; but early in September the enemy relaxed his vigilance and withdrew to the upper end of the lake. Perry then slipped out beyond the bar and fitted his vessels for action. The British fleet opposed to Com. Perry consisted of the ships "Detroit," carrying 19 guns; the "Queen Charlotte," 17 guns; the schooner "Lady Prevost," 13 guns; the brig "Hunter," ten guns; the sloop "Little Belt," three guns; and the schooner "Chippewa," one gun and two swivels; and this fleet was commanded by a veteran officer of tried skill and valor.

At sunrise, Sept. 10, while at anchor at Put-in-Bay, the Commodore espied the enemy toward the head of the lake, and he immediately sailed up and commenced action. His flag vessel, the Lawrence, was engaged with the whole force of the enemy for nearly two hours before the wind permitted the other vessels to come in proper position to help. The crew of this vessel continued the fight until every one of them was either killed or wounded, all the rigging torn to pieces and every gun dismantled. Now comes the daring feat of the engagement which makes Perry a hero. He caused his boat to be lowered, in which he rowed to the Niagara amid the storm of shot and shell raging around him. This vessel he sailed through the enemy's fleet with a swelling breeze, pouring in her broadsides upon their ships and forcing them to surrender in rapid succession, until all were taken. The smaller vessels of his fleet helped in this action, among which was one commanded by the brave and faithful Capt. Elliott. This victory was one of the most decisive in all the annals of American history. It opened the lake to Gen. Wm. H. Harrison, who had been operating in Indiana and Ohio, and who now crossed with his army to Canada, where he had a short campaign, terminated by the battle of the Moravian towns, by which the enemy were driven from the north-western frontier. A detachment of his army occupied Detroit Sept. 29, 1813, and Oct. 18 an armistice was concluded with the Indians, thus restoring tranquillity to the Territory of Michigan. Soon afterward Gen. Harrison left Gen. Cass in command at Detroit and moved with the main body of his army down to the Niagara frontier.

Perry's brilliant success gave to the Americans the uncontrolled command of the lake, and Sept. 23 their fleet landed 1,200 men near Malden. Col. Proctor, however, had previously evacuated that post, after setting fire to the fort and public storehouses. Com. Perry in the meantime passed up to Detroit with the "Ariel" to assist in the occupation of that town, while Capt. Elliott, with the "Lady Prevost," the "Scorpion," and the "Tigress," advanced into Lake St. Clair to intercept the enemy's stores. Thus Gen. Harrison, on his arrival at Detroit and Malden, found both places abandoned by the enemy, and was met by the Canadians asking for his protection. Tecumseh proposed to the British commander that they should hazard an engagement at Malden; but the latter foresaw that he should be exposed to the fire of the American fleet in that position, and therefore resolved to march to the Moravian towns upon the Thames, near St. Clair lake, above Detroit, and there try the chance of a battle. His force at this time consisted of about 900 regular troops, and 1,500 Indians commanded by Tecumseh. The American army amounted to about 2,700 men, of whom 120 were regulars, a considerable number of militia, about 30 Indians, and the remainder Kentucky riflemen, well mounted, and mainly young men, full of ardor, and burning with a desire to revenge the massacre of their friends and relatives at the River Raisin.

During the following winter there were no military movements, except an incursion into the interior of the upper province by Maj. Holmes, who was attacked near Stony creek, and maintained his ground with bravery.

CLOSE OF THE WAR.

The war with Great Britain was now (November, 1813) practically closed, so far as the Northwest was concerned, but the post at Mackinaw yet remained in the hands of the enemy, and active steps were taken to dispossess the English of this point and drive them wholly from the domain of the United States. The first effort to start an expedition failed; but in the summer of 1814 a well-equipped force of two sloops of war, several schooners and 750 land militia, under the command of Com. Sinclair and Lieut.-Col. Croghan, started for the north. Contrary, however, to the advice of experienced men, the commanders concluded to visit St. Joseph first, and the British at Mackinaw heard of their coming and prepared themselves. The consequence was a failure to take the place. Major Holmes was killed, and the Winnebago Indians, from Green Bay, allies of the British, actually cut out the heart and livers from the American slain and cooked and ate them! Com. Sinclair afterward made some arrangements to starve out the post, but his vessels were captured and the British then remained secure in the possession of the place until the treaty of peace the following winter.

The war with England formally closed on Dec. 24, 1814, when a treaty of peace was signed at Ghent. The 9th article of the treaty required the United States to put an end to hostilities with all tribes or nations of Indians with whom they had been at war; to restore to such tribes or nations respectively all the rights and possessions to which they were entitled in 1811, before the war, on condition that such Indians should agree to desist from all hostilities against the United States. But in February, just before the treaty was sanctioned by our Government, there were signs of Indians accumulating arms and ammunition, and a cautionary order was therefore issued to have all the white forces in readiness for an attack by the Indians; but the attack was not made. During the ensuing summer and fall the United States Government acquainted the Indians with the provisions of the treaty, and entered into subordinate treaties of peace with the principal tribes.

Just before the treaty of Spring Wells (near Detroit) was signed, the Shawanee Prophet retired to Canada, declaring his resolution to abide by any treaty which the chiefs might sign. Some time afterward he returned to the Shawanee settlement in Ohio, and lastly to the west of the Mississippi, where he died, in 1834. The British Government allowed him a pension from 1813 until his death.

POLITICAL.

Previous to the formation of the Northwestern Territory, the country within its bounds was claimed by several of the Eastern States, on the ground that it was included within the limits indicated by their charters from the English crown. In answer to the wishes of the Government and people, these States in a patriotic spirit surrendered their claims to this extensive territory, that it might constitute a common fund to aid in the payment of the national debt. To prepare the way for this cession, a law had been passed in October, 1780, that the territory so to be ceded should be disposed of for the common benefit of the whole Union; that the States erected therein should be of suitable extent, not less than 100 nor more than 150 miles square; and that any expenses that might be incurred in recovering the posts then in the hands of the British should be reimbursed. New York released her claims to Congress March 1, 1781; Virginia, March 1, 1784; Massachusetts, April 19, 1785, and Connecticut, Sept. 4, 1786.

Under the French and British dominion the points occupied on the eastern boundary of what is now the State of Michigan were considered a part of New France, or Canada. Detroit was known to the French as Fort Pontchartrain. The military commandant, under both governments, exercised a civil jurisdiction over the settlements surrounding their posts. In 1796, when the British garrisons at Detroit and Mackinaw were replaced by detachments by Gen. Wayne, Michigan became a part of the Northwestern Territory and was organized as the county of Wayne, entitled to one Representative in the General Assembly, held at Chillicothe.

In 1800, Indiana was made a separate Territory, embracing all the country west of the present State of Ohio and of an extension of the western line of that State due north to the territorial limits of the United States; in 1802, the peninsula was annexed to the Territory of Indiana, and in 1805 Michigan began a separate existence. That part of the Territory that lies east of a north and south line through the middle of Lake Michigan was formed into a distinct government, and the provisions of the ordinance of 1787 continued to regulate it. Under this constitution the executive power was invested in a governor, the judicial in three judges, and the legislative in both united; the officers were appointed by the general Government, and their legislative authority was restricted to the adoption of laws from codes of the several States. This form of government was to continue until the Territory should contain 5,000 free white males of full age. It then became optional with the people to choose a legislative body, to be supported by them; but subsequent legislation by Congress more liberally provided a Legislature at the expense of the general Government and also added to privileges in the elective franchise and eligibility to office; as, for example, under the ordinance a freehold qualification was required, both on the part of the elector and of the elected.

The first officers of the Territory of Michigan were: Wm. Hull, Governor; Augustus B. Woodward, Chief Judge; Frederick Bates, Sr., Assistant Judge and Treasurer; John Griffin, Assistant Judge; Col. James May, Marshal; Abijah Hull, Surveyor; Peter Audrain, Clerk of the Legislative Board. May 5, 1807, Joseph Watson was appointed Legislative secretary; in November, 1806, Elijah Brush was appointed treasurer, to succeed Mr. Bates, and the books of the office were delivered over on the 26th of that month; and William McDowell Scott was appointed marshal in November, 1806, to succeed Col. May. The latter never held the office of judge of the Territory, but about 1800-'3 he was chief justice of the court of common pleas.

Augustus Brevoort Woodward was a native of Virginia; was appointed a judge of the Territory in 1805, his term of office expiring Feb. 1, 1824. He was soon after appointed judge of the Territory of Florida, and three years after that he died. The grand scheme of "Catholepistemiad," or State University of Michigan, with its numerous details described under sesquipedalian names from the Greek, owed its origin to Judge Woodward.

John Griffin was appointed assistant judge in 1807, his term of office expiring Feb. 1, 1824. He was a native of Virginia, and died in Philadelphia about 1840.

James Witherell was a native of Massachusetts; was appointed a judge of the Territory April 23, 1808, his term of office expiring Feb. 1, 1824, when he was re-appointed for four years, and Feb. 1, 1828, he was appointed Territorial secretary.

When in 1818 Illinois was admitted into the Union, all the territory lying north of that State and of Indiana was annexed to Michigan. In 1819, the Territory was authorized to elect a delegate to Congress, according to the present usage with reference to Territories; previous to this time, according to the ordinance 1787, a Territory was not entitled to a delegate until it entered upon the "second grade of Government," and the delegate was then to be chosen by the General Assembly.

In 1823 Congress abolished the legislative power of the governor and judges, and granted more enlarged ones to a council, to be composed of nine persons selected by the President of the United States from eighteen chosen by the electors of the Territory; and by this law, also, eligibility to office was made co-extensive with the right of suffrage as established by the act of 1819; also the judicial term of office was limited to four years. In 1825 all county officers, except those of a judicial nature, were made elective, and the appointments which remained in the hands of the executive were made subject to the approval of the legislative council. In 1827 the electors were authorized to choose a number of persons for the legislative council, which was empowered to enact all laws not inconsistent with the ordinance of 1787. Their acts, however, were subject to abolishment by Congress and to veto by the territorial executives.

When Gen. Wm. Hull arrived at Detroit to assume his official duties as Governor, he found the town in ruins, it having been destroyed by fire. Whether it had been burned by design or accident was not known. The inhabitants were without food and shelter, camping in the open fields; still they were not discouraged, and soon commenced rebuilding their houses on the same site; Congress also kindly granted the sufferers the site of the old town of Detroit and 10,000 acres of land adjoining. A territorial militia was organized, and a code of laws was adopted similar to those of the original States. This code was signed by Gov. Hull, Augustus B. Woodward and Frederick Bates, judges of the Territory, and was called the "Woodward code."

At this time the bounds of the Territory embraced all the country on the American side of the Detroit river, east of the north and south line through the center of Lake Michigan. The Indian land claims had been partially extinguished previous to this period. By the treaty of Fort McIntosh in 1785, and that of Fort Harmar in 1787, extensive cessions had been either made or confirmed, and in 1807 the Indian titles to several tracts became entirely extinct. Settlements having been made under the French and English governments, with irregularity or absence of definite surveys and records, some confusion sprang up in regard to the titles to valuable tracts. Accordingly Congress established a Board of Commissioners to examine and settle these conflicting claims, and in 1807 another act was passed, confirming, to a certain extent, the titles of all such as had been in possession of the lands then occupied by them from the year 1796, the year of the final evacuation by the British garrisons. Other acts were subsequently passed, extending the same conditions to the settlements on the upper lakes.

As chief among the fathers of this State we may mention Gen. Lewis Cass, Stevens T. Mason, Augustus B. Woodward, John Norvell, Wm. Woodbridge, John Biddle, Wm. A. Fletcher, Elon Farnsworth, Solomon Sibley, Benj. B. Kircheval, John R. Williams, George Morrell, Daniel Goodwin, Augustus S. Porter, Benj. F. H. Witherell, Jonathan Shearer and Charles C. Trowbridge, all of Wayne county; Edmund Munday, James Kingsley and Alpheus Felch, of Washtenaw; Ross Wilkins and John J. Adam, of Lenawee; Warner Wing, Charles Noble and Austin E. Wing, of Monroe county; Randolph Manning, O. D. Richardson and James B. Hunt, of Oakland; Henry R. Schoolcraft, of Chippewa; Albert Miller, of the Saginaw Valley; John Stockton and Robert P. Eldridge, of Macomb; Lucius Lyon, Charles E. Stuart, Edwin H. Lothrop, Epaphroditus Ransom and Hezekiah G. Wells, of Kalamazoo; Isaac E. Crary, John D. Pierce and Oliver C. Comstock, of Calhoun; Kinsley S. Bingham, of Livingston; John S. Barry, of St. Joseph; Charles W. Whipple, Calvin Britain and Thomas Fitzgerald, of Berrien; and George Redfield, of Cass. These men and their compeers shaped the policy of the State, and decided what should be its future. They originated all and established most of the great institutions which are the evidences of our advanced civilization, and of which we are so justly proud.

ADMINISTRATION OF GEN. CASS.

At the close of the war with Great Britain in 1814, an era of prosperity dawned upon the infant territory. Gen. Lewis Cass, who had served the Government with great distinction during the war, was appointed Governor. The condition of the people was very much reduced, the country was wild, and the British flag still waved over the fort at Mackinaw. There was nothing inviting to immigrants except the mere facts of the close of the war and the existence of a fertile soil and a good climate. The Indians were still dangerous, and the country was still comparatively remote from the centers of civilization and government. Such a set of circumstances was just the proper environment for the development of all those elements of the "sturdy pioneer" which we so often admire in writing up Western history. Here was the field for stout and brave men; here was the place for the birth and education of real Spartan men,—men of strength, moral courage and indomitable perseverance.

At first, Gen. Cass had also the care of a small portion of Canada opposite Detroit, and he had only 27 soldiers for defending Detroit against the hostile Indians and carrying on the whole government. Believing that a civil governor should not be encumbered also with military duty, he resigned his brigadier-generalship in the army. But as Governor he soon had occasion to exercise his military power, even to act on the field as commander, in chasing away marauding bands of Indians. The latter seemed to be particularly threatening at this time, endeavoring to make up in yelling and petty depredations what they lacked in sweeping victory over all the pale-faces.

In times of peace Gov. Cass had high notions of civilizing the Indians, encouraging the purchase of their lands, limiting their hunting grounds to a narrow compass, teaching them agriculture and mechanics and providing the means for their instruction and religious training. The policy of the French and English had been to pacify them with presents and gewgaws, merely to obtain a temporary foothold for the purpose of carrying on the fur trade. Those benefited by the trade lived thousands of miles away and had no interest in the permanent development of the country. The United States Government, on the other hand, indorsed Gov. Cass' policy, which was to result in the development of the wealth of the country and the establishment of all the arts of peace. Gens. Cass and Harrison were accordingly empowered to treat with the Indians on the Miami and Wabash; and July 20 a treaty was signed with the Wyandots, Senecas, Shawnees, Miamis and Delawares, which restored comparative tranquillity. During the summer, however, there was Indian war enough to call out all of Gov. Cass' men, in aid of Gen. Brown on the Niagara. Indians can never remain long at peace, whatever may be the obligations they assume in treaty-making. Gov. Cass often headed his forces in person and drove the hostile tribes from place to place until they finally retreated to Saginaw.

An attempt was made to recover Mackinaw from the English in July of this year (1814), but the British works were too strong; however, the establishments at St. Joseph and at Sault Ste. Marie were destroyed. In the following winter the final treaty of peace was ratified between England and the United States. The population of the territory at this time was not over 5,000 or 6,000, scattered over a vast extent, and in a state of great destitution on account of the calamities of war. Scarcely a family, on resuming the duties of home, found more than the remnants of former wealth and comfort. Families had been broken up and dispersed; parents had been torn from their children, and children from each other; some had been slain on the battle-field, and others had been massacred by the ruthless savages. Laws had become a dead letter, and morals had suffered in the general wreck. Agriculture had been almost abandoned and commerce paralyzed; food and all necessities of life were scarce, and luxuries unknown. Money was difficult to get, and the bank paper of Ohio, which was almost the sole circulating medium, was 25 per cent below par.

Such was the gloomy state of domestic affairs when Gen. Cass assumed the office of governor. Besides, he had the delicate task of aiding in legislation and of being at the same time the sole executive of the law. In 1817 he made an important treaty with the Indians, by which their title was extinguished to nearly all the land in Ohio, and a great portion in Indiana and Michigan. This treaty attached the isolated population of Michigan to the State of Ohio, made the Territorial government in a fuller sense an integral member of the federal Union, and removed all apprehension of a hostile confederacy among the Indian tribes along the lake and river frontier.

Hitherto there had not been a road in Michigan, except the military road along the Detroit river; but as the Indian settlements and lands could not now be interposed as a barrier, Gen. Cass called the attention of Congress to the necessity of a military road from Detroit to Sandusky, through a trackless morass called the black swamp.

In the summer of this year, the first newspaper published in Michigan was started at Detroit. It was called the Detroit Gazette, and was published by Messrs. Sheldon & Reed, two enterprising young men, the former of whom published an interesting and valuable early history of Michigan.

The "Western Sun" was the first newspaper published in the Indiana Territory, now comprising the four great States of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, and the second in all that country once known as the "Northwestern Territory." It was commenced at Vincennes in 1803, by Elihu Stout, of Kentucky, and first called the Indiana Gazette, and July 4, 1804, was changed to the Western Sun. Mr. Stout continued the paper until 1845, amid many discouragements, when he was appointed postmaster at the place, and he sold out the office.

May 6, 1812, Congress passed an act requiring that 2,000,000 acres of land should be surveyed in the Territory of Louisiana, the same amount in the Territory of Illinois, and the same amount in the Territory of Michigan, in all 6,000,000 acres, to be set apart for the soldiers in the war with Great Britain. Each soldier was to have 160 acres of land, fit for cultivation. The surveyors under this law reported that there were no lands in Michigan fit for cultivation! This unconscionable report deterred immigration for many years, and the Government took the whole 6,000,000 acres from Illinois and Missouri. The language of that report is so remarkable that we must quote it:

"The country on the Indian boundary line, from the mouth of the Great Auglaize river and running thence for about 50 miles, is (with some few exceptions) low, wet land, with a very thick growth of underbrush, intermixed with very bad marshes, but generally very heavily timbered with beech, cottonwood, oak, etc.; thence continuing north and extending from the Indian boundary eastward, the number and extent of the swamps increase, with the addition of numbers of lakes, from 20 chains to two and three miles across. Many of the lakes have extensive marshes adjoining their margins, sometimes thickly covered with a species of pine called 'tamarack,' and other places covered with a coarse, high grass, and uniformly covered from six inches to three feet (and more at times) with water. The margins of these lakes are not the only places where swamps are found, for they are interspersed throughout the whole country and filled with water, as above stated, and varying in extent. The intermediate space between these swamps and lakes, which is probably near one-half of the country, is, with a very few exceptions, a poor, barren, sandy land on which scarcely any vegetation grows except very small, scrubby oaks. In many places that part which may be called dry land is composed of little, short sand-hills, forming a kind of deep basins, the bottoms of many of which are composed of a marsh similar to the above described. The streams are generally narrow, and very deep compared with their width, the shores and bottoms of which are, with a very few exceptions, swampy beyond description; and it is with the utmost difficulty that a place can be found over which horses can be conveyed with safety.

“A circumstance peculiar to that country is exhibited in many of the marshes by their being thinly covered with a sward of grass, by walking on which evinced the existence of water or a very thin mud immediately under their covering, which sinks from six to eighteen inches from the pressure of the foot at every step, and at the same time rising before and behind the person passing over. The margins of many of the lakes and streams are in a similar situation, and in many places are literally afloat. On approaching the eastern part of the military lands, toward the private claims on the straights and lake, the country does not contain so many swamps and lakes, but the extreme sterility and barrenness of the soil continues the same. Taking the country altogether, so far as has been explored, and to all appearances, together with the information received concerning the balance, it is so bad there would not be more than one acre out of a hundred, if there would be one out of a thousand, that would in any case admit of cultivation.”

It is probable that those Government surveyors made a lazy job of their duty and depended almost entirely upon the fur traders, who were interested in keeping settlers out of the country. But we must make allowance, too, for the universal ignorance existing at that time of the methods of developing the Western country which modern invention has brought to bear since the days of our forefathers. We must remember that our Western prairies were counted worth nothing, even by all the early settlers.

By the year 1818 some immigrants crowded in and further explored and tested the land; and in March, this year, Gov. Cass called for the views of the inhabitants upon the question of changing the civil authority by entering upon the second grade of Territorial government. A vote was taken and a majority were found to be against it; but for the purpose of facilitating immigration and settlement, Gov. Cass recommended to the Secretary of the Treasury that the lands in the district of Detroit be at once brought into market. The department immediately complied, and the lands were offered for sale the following autumn. Immigration was now increased more than ever before, and the permanent growth of the country became fully established.

In 1819 the people were allowed to elect a delegate to Congress. The population was now 8,806 in the whole Territory, distributed as follows: Detroit, 1,450, not including the garrison; the Island of Mackinaw, still the entrepot of the fur trade, a stationary population of about 450, sometimes increased to 2,000 or over; Sault Ste. Marie, 15 or 20 houses, occupied by French and English families.

The year 1819 was also rendered memorable by the appearance of the first steamboat on the lakes, the "Walk-in-the-water," which came up Lake Erie and went on to Mackinaw.

Up to this time no executive measures had been taken by the people to avail themselves of the school lands appropriated by the ordinance of 1787, except the curious act passed by the Governor and judges establishing the "Catholepistemiad," or University of Michigan, with 13 "didaxia," or professorships. The scheme for this institution was a grand one, described by quaint, sesquipedalian technicalities coined from the Greek language, and the whole devised by that unique man, Judge Woodward. The act is given in full in the Territorial laws of Michigan, compiled and printed a few years ago. It was Judge Woodward, also, who laid out the plan of Detroit, in the form of a cobweb, with a "campus Martius" and a grand circus, and avenues radiating in every direction, grand public parks and squares, etc. Centuries would be required to fulfill his vast design. Like authors and artists of ancient Greece and Rome, he laid the foundations of grand work for posterity more than for the passing generation.

Settlements now began to form at the points where now are the cities of Ann Arbor, Ypsilanti, Jackson, Tecumseh and Pontiac. There were still some annoyances by the Indians. The Sacs and Foxes annually made their appearance to receive presents from the British agents at Malden, and as they passed along they would commit many depredations. This practice of the British Government had a tendency to prejudice the Indians against the Americans, and it thus became necessary to take some measures for removing the Indians beyond British influence or otherwise putting a stop to this dangerous custom. Accordingly, in the fall of 1819, Gov. Cass desired the Government at Washington to cause a more thorough exploration to be made of the lake region, estimating the number and influence of the Indians, their relations, prejudices, etc., with a view to the further extinguishment of Indian title to land, etc.; but the Government deemed it advisable at this time only to take 10 miles square at Sault Ste. Marie for military purposes, and some islands near Mackinaw, where beds of plaster had been found to exist. However, the general Government soon ordered an expedition to be fitted out for such an exploration as Gov. Cass desired, to travel with birch canoes. The men composing the expedition were Gen. Cass and Robert A. Forsyth, his private secretary; Capt. D. B. Douglass, topographer and astronomer; Dr. Alex. Wolcot, physician; James D. Doty, official secretary; and Charles C. Trowbridge, assistant topographer. Lieut. Evans Mackey was commander of the escort, which consisted of 10 U. S. soldiers. Besides these there were 10 Canadian voyageurs, to manage the canoes, and 10 Indians to act as hunters. The latter were under the direction of James Riley and Joseph Parks, who were also to act as interpreters.

This party left Detroit March 24, 1820, and reached Michilimackinac, June 6. On leaving this place June 14, 22 soldiers, under the command of Lieut. John S. Pierce, were added to the party, and the expedition now numbered 64 persons. They reached the Sault Ste. Marie the 16th, where Gen. Cass called the Indians (Chippewas) together, in order to have a definite understanding with them concerning the boundary lines of the land grants, and thereby renew also their sanction of former treaties. At first the Indians protested against the Americans having any garrison at the place, and some of them grew violent and almost precipitated a general fight, which would have been disastrous to Gen. Cass' party, as the Indians were far more numerous; but Cass exhibited a great degree of coolness and courage, and caused more deliberate counsels to prevail among the savages. Thus the threatened storm blew over.

The next day the expedition resumed their journey, on Lake Superior, passing the "pictured rocks," and landing at one place where there was a band of friendly Chippewas. June 25 they left Lake Superior, ascended Portage river and returned home by way of Lake Michigan, after having traveled over 4,000 miles.

The results of the expedition were: a more thorough knowledge of a vast region and of the numbers and disposition of the various tribes of Indians; several important Indian treaties, by which valuable lands were ceded to the United States; a knowledge of the operations of the Northwest Fur Company; and the selection of sites for a line of military posts.

As the greatest want of the people seemed to be roads, Congress was appealed to for assistance, and not in vain; for that body immediately provided for the opening of roads between Detroit and the Miami river, from Detroit to Chicago, and from Detroit to Fort Gratiot, and for the improvement of La Plaisance Bay. Government surveys were carried into the Territory. Two straight lines were drawn through the center of the Territory,—east and west, and north and south, the latter being denominated the principal meridian and the former the base line. The Territory was also divided into townships of six miles square.

In 1821 there was still a tract of land lying south of Grand river which had not yet been added to the United States, and Gov. Cass deemed it necessary to negotiate with the Indians for it. To accomplish this work he had to visit Chicago; and as a matter of curiosity we will inform the reader of his most feasible route to that place, which he can contrast with that of the present day. Leaving Detroit, he descended to the mouth of the Maumee river; he ascended that river and crossed the intervening country to the Wabash; descended that stream to the Ohio; down the latter to the Mississippi, and up this and the Illinois rivers to Chicago!

At this council the American commissioners were Gen. Cass and Judge Sibley, of Detroit. They were successful in their undertaking, and obtained a cession of the land in question. On this occasion the Indians exhibited in a remarkable manner their appetite for whisky. As a preliminary step to the negotiations, the commissioners ordered that no spirits should be given to the Indians. The chief of the latter was a man about a hundred years old, but still of a good constitution. The commissioners urged every consideration to convince him and the other Indians of the propriety of the course they had adopted, but in vain. "Father," said the old chieftain, "we do not care for the land, nor the money, nor the goods: what we want is whisky; give us whisky." But the commissioners were inexorable, and the Indians were forced to content themselves.

This year (1821) also two Indians were hung for murder. There was some fear that the event would be made by the British an occasion of arousing Indian atrocities in the vicinity, and the petition for the pardon of the wretches was considered by Gov. Cass with a great deal of embarrassment. He finally concluded to let the law take its course, and accordingly, Dec. 25, the murderers were hung.

In 1822 six new counties were created, namely, Lapeer, Sanilac, Saginaw, Shiawassee, Washtenaw and Lenawee; and they contained much more territory than they do at the present day. This year the first stage line was established in the Territory, connecting the county seat of Macomb county with the steamer "Walk-in-the-Water" at Detroit.

In 1823 Congress changed the form of Territorial government, abrogating the legislative power of the governor and judges and establishing a "Legislative Council," to consist of nine members, appointed by the President of the United States out of 18 candidates elected by the people. By the same act the term of judicial office was limited to four years, and eligibility to office was made to require the same qualifications as the right to suffrage. The people now took new interest in their government, and felt encouraged to lay deeper the foundations of future prosperity. The first legislative council under the new regime met at Detroit June 7, 1824, when Gov. Cass delivered his message, reviewing the progress of the Territory, calling attention to the needs of popular education and recommending a policy of governmental administration. During this year he also called the attention of the general Government to the mineral resources of the Superior region, and asked for governmental explorations therein. At its second session after this, Congress authorized a commission to treat with the Indians of the upper peninsula for permission to explore that country.

In 1825 the Erie canal was completed from the Hudson river to Buffalo, N. Y., and the effect was to increase materially the flow of people and wealth into the young Territory of Michigan. The citizens of the East began to learn the truth concerning the agricultural value of this peninsula, and those in search of good and permanent homes came to see for themselves, and afterward came with their friends or families to remain as industrious residents, to develop a powerful State. The number in the Territorial council was increased to 13, to be chosen by the President from 26 persons elected by the people. In 1827 an act was passed authorizing the electors to choose their electors directly, without the further sanction of either the President or Congress. The power of enacting laws was given to the council, subject, however, to the approval of Congress and the veto of the Governor. This form of Territorial government remained in force until Michigan was organized as a State in 1837. William Woodbridge was Secretary of the Territory during the administration of Gov. Cass, and deserves great credit for the ability with which he performed the duties of his office. In the absence of the chief executive he was acting governor, and a portion of the time he represented the Territory as a delegate to Congress. In 1828 he was succeeded by James Witherell, and in two years by Gen. John T. Mason.

In 1831 Gen. Cass was appointed Secretary of War in the cabinet of President Jackson, after having served Michigan as its chief executive for 18 years. He had been appointed six times, running through the presidency of Madison, Monroe and John Q. Adams, without any opposing candidate or a single vote against him in the senate. He faithfully discharged his duties as Indian commissioner and concluded 19 treaties with the Indians, acquiring large cessions of territory in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Wisconsin and Michigan. He was a practical patriot of whom the people of the peninsular State justly feel proud. Probably more than any other man, Gen. Cass was the father of Michigan.

GEN. GEO. B. PORTER'S ADMINISTRATION.

On the promotion of Gen. Cass to a seat in the cabinet of President Jackson and his consequent resignation as Governor of Michigan, Gen. Geo. B. Porter was appointed Governor in July, 1831, and Sept. 22 following he entered upon the duties of the office. The population of the Territory at this time was about 35,000, prosperity was reigning all around and peace everywhere prevailed, except that in 1832 the Black Hawk war took place in Illinois, but did not affect this peninsula. In this war, however, Gov. Porter co-operated with other States in furnishing militia.

While Gov. Porter was the chief executive, Wisconsin was detached from Michigan and erected into a separate Territory; many new townships were organized and wagon roads opened and improved; land began to rise rapidly in value, and speculators multiplied. The council provided for the establishment and regulation of common schools, incorporated "The Lake Michigan Steamboat Company," with a capital of $40,000; and incorporated the first railroad company in Michigan, the "Detroit & St. Joseph Railroad Company," since called the "Michigan Central." The original corporators were, John Biddle, John R. Williams, Charles Larned, E. P. Hastings, Oliver Newberry, De Garmo James, James Abbott, John Gilbert, Abel Millington, Job Gorton, John Allen, Anson Brown, Samuel W. Dexter, W. E. Perrine, Wm. A. Thompson, Isaac Crary. O. W. Colden, Caleb Eldred, Cyrus Lovell, Calvin Brittain and Talman Wheeler. The act of incorporation required that the road should be completed within 30 years; this condition was complied with in less than one-third of that time. The same council also incorporated the "Bank of the River Raisin," with a branch at Pontiac. Previous to this two other banks had been chartered, namely: the "Bank of Michigan," in 1817, with a branch at Bronson, and the "Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Michigan," with a branch at St. Joseph.

The Legislative Council of 1834 also authorized a vote of the residents to be taken on the question of organizing as a State and becoming a member of the Union; but the vote was so light and the majority so small that Congress neglected to consider the matter seriously until two years afterward.

During Porter's administration a change was made in the method of disposing of the public lands, greatly to the benefit of the actual settlers. Prior to 1820 the Government price of land was $2 an acre, one-fourth to be paid down and the remainder in three annual installments; and the land was subject to forfeiture if these payments were not promptly made. This system having been found productive of many serious evils, the price of land was put at $1.25 an acre, all to be paid at the time of purchase. This change saved a deal of trouble.

During the administration of Gov. Porter occurred the "Black Hawk" war, mainly in Illinois, in 1832, which did not affect Michigan to any appreciable extent, except to raise sundry fears by the usual alarms accompanying war gossip. A few volunteers probably went to the scene of action from this Territory, but if any systematic account was ever kept of this service, we fail to find it.

In October, 1831, Edwin Jerome left Detroit with a surveying party composed of John Mullet, surveyor, and Utter, Brink and Peck, for that portion of Michigan Territory lying west of Lake Michigan, now Wisconsin. Their outfit consisted of a French pony team and a buffalo wagon to carry tent, camp equipage, blankets, etc. Most of the way to the southeast corner of Lake Michigan they followed a wagon track or an Indian trail, and a cabin or an Indian hut to lodge in at night; but west of the point mentioned they found neither road nor inhabitant. They arrived at Chicago in a terrible rain and "put-up" at the fort. This far-famed city at that time had but five or six houses, and they were built of logs. Within a distance of three or four miles of the fort the land was valued by its owners at 50 cents an acre.

After 23 days' weary travel through an uninhabited country, fording and swimming streams and exposed to much rainy weather, they arrived at Galena, where they commenced their survey, but in two days the ground froze so deep that further work was abandoned until the next spring. The day after the memorable Stillman battle with Black Hawk, while the Mullet party were crossing the Blue mounds, they met an Indian half-chief, who had just arrived from the Menominee camps with the details of the battle. He stated the slain to be three Indians and 11 whites. The long shaking of hands and the extreme cordiality of this Indian alarmed Mullet for the safety of his party, but he locked the secret in his own heart until the next day. They had just completed a town corner when Mullet, raising himself to his full height, said, "Boys, I'm going in; I'll not risk my scalp for a few paltry shillings." This laconic speech was an electric shock to the whole company. Mr. Jerome, in describing his own sensations, said that the hair of his head then became as porcupine quills, raising his hat in the air and himself from the ground; and the top of his head became as sore as a boil.

July 6, 1834, Gov. Porter died, and the administration devolved upon the secretary of the Territory, Stevens T. Mason, during whose time occurred

THE "TOLEDO WAR."

This difficulty was inaugurated by a conflict of the acts of Congress from time to time, made either carelessly or in ignorance of the geography of the West and of the language of former public acts. Michigan claimed as her southern boundary a line running from the extreme southern point of Lake Michigan directly east to Lake Erie, which would include Toledo, an important point, as it was the principal terminus of the proposed Wabash & Erie canal. This claim was made by virtue of clauses in the ordinance of 1787. Ohio, on the other hand, claimed that the ordinance had been superseded by the Constitution of the United States, and that Congress had the right to regulate the boundary; also, that the constitution of that State, which had been accepted by Congress, described a line different from that claimed by Michigan. Mr. Woodbridge, the delegate from Michigan, ably opposed in Congress the claim of Ohio, and the committee on public lands decided unanimously in favor of this State; but in the hurry of business no action was taken by Congress and the question remained open.

The claim of Michigan was based principally upon the following points: The ordinance of 1787 declares the acts therein contained "articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in said Territory (northwest of the river Ohio), and forever to remain unalterable, unless by common consent." This ordinance defines the Territory to include all that region lying north and northwest of the Ohio and east of the Mississippi rivers. In the fifth article it is provided that there shall be formed not less than three nor more than five States within its limits. The boundaries of the three States are defined so as to include the whole Territory; conditioned, however, that if it should be found expedient by Congress to form the one or two more States mentioned, Congress is authorized to alter boundaries of the three States "so as to form one or two States in that part of the said Territory which lies north of the east and west line drawn through the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan."

In 1802 Congress enabled the people of Ohio to form a constitution, and in that act the boundary of that State is declared to be "on the north by an east and west line drawn through the southerly extreme of Lake Michigan, running east, after intersecting the due north line aforesaid from the mouth of the Great Miami, until it shall intersect Lake Erie, or the Territorial line, and thence with the same through Lake Erie to the Pennsylvania line." The constitution of Ohio adopted the same line, with this condition: "Provided always, and it is hereby fully understood and declared by this convention, that if the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan should extend so far south that a line drawn due east from it should not intersect Lake Erie; or, if it should intersect Lake Erie east of the mouth of the Miami river, then in that case, with the assent of Congress, the northern boundary of this State shall be established by and extend to a direct line running from the southern extremity of Lake Michigan to the most northerly cape of the Miami bay, after intersecting the due north line from the mouth of the Great Miami, as aforesaid, thence northeast of the Territorial line, and by said Territorial line to the Pennsylvania line."

Congress did not act upon this proviso until 1805, and during this interval it seems that Ohio herself did not regard it as a part of her accepted constitution.

Again, this section of the act of 1802 provides that all that part of the Territory lying north of this east and west line "shall be attached to and make a part of the Indiana Territory." Still again, the act of 1805, entitled "an act to divide the Indiana Territory into separate governments," erects Michigan to a separate Territory, and defines the southern boundary to be "a line drawn east from the southerly bend or extreme of Lake Michigan until it intersects Lake Erie."

The strip of territory in dispute is about five miles wide at the west end and eight miles at the east end. The line claimed by Michigan was known as the "Fulton line," and that claimed by Ohio was known as the "Harris line," from the names of the surveyors. This territory was valuable for its rich farming land, but its chief value was deemed to consist at that time in its harbor on the Maumee river, where now stands the city of Toledo, and which was the eastern terminus of the proposed Wabash & Erie canal. This place was originally called Swan creek, afterward Port Lawrence, then Vistula and finally Toledo. The early settlers generally acknowledged their allegiance to Michigan; but when the canal became a possibility, and its termination at Toledo being dependent upon the contingency whether or not it was in Ohio, many of the inhabitants became desirous of being included within the latter State. Then disputes grew more violent and the Legislatures of the respective commonwealths led off in the fight. In February, 1835, the Legislature of Ohio passed an act extending the jurisdiction of the State over the territory in question, directed local elections to be held and a re-survey to be made of the Harris line. Per contra, Gov. Mason urged the Legislative Council of Michigan to take active measures to counteract the proceedings of the Ohio Legislature; and accordingly that body passed an act making it a criminal offense for any one to attempt to exercise any official functions within the jurisdiction of Michigan without authority from the Territory or the general Government. March 9, 1835, Gov. Mason ordered Gen. Brown to hold the Michigan militia in readiness to meet the enemy in the field in case an attempt was made by the agents of Ohio to carry out the provisions of the Legislature of that State. On the 31st Gov. Lucas, of Ohio, arrived at Perrysburg with his commissioners, on his way to re-survey the Harris line. He was accompanied by a militia of about 600 men. In the meantime Gov. Mason mustered about 1,200 men, with Gen. Brown commanding, and was in possession of Toledo. In a few days two commissioners arrived from Washington on a mission of peace, and remonstrated with Gov. Lucas. After several conferences with the two Governors they submitted propositions of a temporary nature, virtually giving the disputed territory to Ohio until the following session of Congress, to which Gov. Lucas assented, but Gov. Mason did not. President Jackson asked the opinion of the attorney general, Mr. Butler, who replied in favor of Michigan; notwithstanding, Gov. Lucas proceeded to order his men to commence the survey, but as they were passing through Lenawee county the under-sheriff there arrested a portion of the party, while the rest ran away like Indians, and spread an exaggerated report of actual war. This being corrected by an amusing official report of the under-sheriff, Gov. Lucas called an extra session of the Ohio Legislature, which passed an act "to prevent the forcible abduction of the citizens of Ohio!" It also adopted measures to organize the county of "Lucas," with Toledo as the county-seat, and to carry into effect the laws of the State over the disputed territory.

In the meantime the Michigan people in and about Toledo busied themselves in arresting Ohio emissaries who undertook to force the laws of their State upon Michigan Territory, while Ohio partisans feebly attempted to retaliate. An amusing instance is related of the arrest of one Major Stickney. He and his whole family fought valiantly, but were at length overcome by numbers. The Major had to be tied on a horse before he would ride with the Michigan posse to jail. An attempt was then made to arrest a son of the Major called "Two Stickney," when a serious struggle followed and the officer was stabbed with a knife. The blood flowed pretty freely, but the wound did not prove dangerous. This was probably the only blood shed during the "war." The officer let go his hold and Stickney fled to Ohio. He was indicted by the grand jury of Monroe county, and a requisition was made on the Governor of Ohio for his rendition, but the Governor refused to give him up. An account of this affair reaching the ears of the President, he recommended that Gov. Mason interpose no obstacle to the re-survey of the Harris line; but the Governor refusing to abide by the "recommendation," the President superseded him by the appointment of Charles Shaler, of Pennsylvania, as his successor. He also advised Gov. Lucas to refrain from exercising any jurisdiction over the disputed territory until Congress should convene and act upon the matter. This was humiliating to that Governor, and he resolved to assert the dignity of his State in Toledo in some manner. He hit upon the plan of ordering a session of court to be held there, with a regiment of militia for the protection of the judges. Accordingly the judges met on Sunday afternoon, Sept. 6, at Maumee, a few miles from Toledo. Some time during the evening a scout sent out by the colonel returned from Toledo and reported that 1,200 men, under command of Gen. Brown, were in Toledo ready to demolish court, soldiers and all; but this report turned out to be false. During the scare, however, the judges hesitated to proceed to Toledo, and the colonel of the regiment upbraided them for their cowardice, and proposed to escort them with his militia during the dead of night to a certain school-house in Toledo, where they might go through the form of holding court a few minutes in safety. About three o'clock Monday morning they arrived at the designated place and "held court" about two minutes and then fled for dear life back to Maumee! Thus was the "honor and dignity" of the great State of Ohio "vindicated over all her enemies!"

ADMINISTRATION OF GOV. HORNER.

It appears that Mr. Shaler did not accept the governorship of Michigan, and John S. Horner, of Virginia, was soon afterward appointed secretary and Acting Governor. He proved to be rather unpopular with the people of Michigan, and the following May he was appointed secretary of Wisconsin Territory. He carried on a lengthy correspondence with Gov. Lucas, which resulted in a discontinuance of all the suits that had grown out of the Toledo war except the demand for Two Stickney. Gov. Lucas persisted in refusing to deliver him up; but it seems that finally no serious trouble came of the affair.

The first Monday in October, 1835, the people of Michigan ratified the constitution and by the same vote elected a full set of State officers. Stevens B. Mason was elected Governor, Edward Mundy, Lieutenant-Governor, and Isaac E. Crary, Representative in Congress. The first Legislature under the constitution was held at Detroit, the capital, on the first Monday in November, and John Norvell and Lucius Lyon were elected U. S. Senators. A regular election was also held under the Territorial law for delegate to Congress, and Geo. W. Jones, of Wisconsin, received the certificate of election, although it is said that Wm. Woodbridge received the highest number of votes. John S. Horner, the Territorial Governor, was still in office here, and this singular mixture of Territorial and State government continued until the following June, when Congress formally admitted Michigan into the Union as a State and Horner was sent to Wisconsin, as before noted. This act of Congress conditioned that the celebrated strip of territory over which the quarrel had been so violent and protracted, should be given to Ohio, and that Michigan might have as a compensation the upper peninsula. That section of country was then known only as a barren waste, containing some copper, no one knew how much. Of course this decision by Congress was unsatisfactory to the people of this State. This was the third excision of territory from Michigan, other clippings having been made in 1802 and 1816. In the former year more than a thousand square miles was given to Ohio, and in the latter year nearly 1,200 square miles was given to Indiana. Accordingly, Gov. Mason convened the Legislature July 11, 1836, to act on the proposition of Congress. The vote stood 21 for acceptance and 28 for rejection. Three delegates were appointed to repair to Washington, to co-operate with the representatives there for the general interest of the State: but before Congress was brought to final action on the matter, other conventions were held in the State to hasten a decision. An informal one held at Ann Arbor Dec. 14 unanimously decided to accept the proposition of Congress and let the disputed strip of territory go to Ohio, and thereupon Jan. 26, 1837, Michigan was admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

MICHIGAN AS A STATE.

A State! This word contains a vast amount of meaning. Before a community becomes a State, there is comparatively a dead level of homogeneity, the history of which consists simply of a record of independent or disconnected events, as Indian wars, migration, etc.; but when a people so far advance in civilization that they must organize, like the plant and animal kingdoms, they must assume "organs," having functions; and the more civilized and dense the population, the more numerous and complicated these organs must become,—to use the language of modern biology, the more the organism must "differentiate."

Correspondingly, the history of Michigan, up to its organization as a State, like that of all our Territories, is almost a disconnected series of events; but on assuming the character of a State, its organs and functions multiply, becoming all the while more and more dependent upon one another. To follow up the history of the State, therefore, with the same proportional fullness as we do its Territorial epoch, would swell the work to scores or hundreds of volumes; for the compiler would be obliged to devote at first a volume to one feature, say the educational, and then soon divide his subject into the various departments of the educational work of the State, devoting a volume to each, and then subdivide, taking each local institution by itself, and subdivide still farther, and so on ad infinitum, devoting a volume to each movement in the career of every institution.

As it is therefore impracticable to preserve the proportion of history to the end, the writer is obliged to generalize more and more as he approaches the termination of any selected epoch in the progress of a growing organism. Accordingly, from this point onward in the history of Michigan, we will treat the subject matter mainly by topics, commencing with an outline of the several gubernatorial administrations.

THE ADMINISTRATIONS.

Stevens T. Mason was the first Governor of this State, having been elected (Governor of the State prospectively) in 1835, as before noted, and he held the office until January, 1840. This State, at the time of its admission into the Union, had a population of about 200,000; its area was about 40,000 square miles, which was divided into 36 counties.

Nearly the first act passed by the Legislature was one for the organization and support of common schools. Congress had already set apart one section of land in every township for this purpose, and the new State properly appreciated the boon. In March of the same year (1837) another act was passed establishing the University of Michigan, of which institution we speak more fully on subsequent pages. This Legislature also appropriated $20,000 for a geological survey, and appointed Dr. Douglass Houghton State geologist. For the encouragement of internal improvements, a board of seven commissioners was appointed, of which the Governor was made president. This board authorized several surveys for railroads. Three routes were surveyed through the State, which eventually became, respectively, the Michigan Central, the Michigan Southern, and the Detroit & Milwaukee. The latter road, however, was originally intended to have Port Huron for its eastern terminus. The next year appropriations were made for the survey of the St. Joseph, Kalamazoo and Grand rivers, for the purpose of improving the navigation.

In 1839 the militia of the State was organized, and eight divisions, with two brigades of two regiments each, were provided for. This year, also, the State prison at Jackson was completed. Nearly 30,000 pupils attended the common schools this year, and for school purposes over $18,000 was appropriated. Agriculturally, the State yielded that year 21,944 bushels of rye, 1,116,910 of oats, 6,422 of buckwheat, 43,826 pounds of flax, 524 of hemp, 89,610 head of cattle, 14,059 head of horses, 22,684 head of sheep and 109,096 of swine.

Gov. William Woodbridge was the chief executive from January, 1840, to February, 1841, when he resigned to accept a seat in the U. S. Senate. J. Wright Gordon was Lieut.-Governor, and became Acting Governor on the resignation of Gov. Woodbridge.

During the administration of these men, the railroad from Detroit to Ann Arbor, a distance of 40 miles, was completed; branches of the University were established at Detroit, Pontiac, Monroe, Niles, Kalamazoo, Grand Rapids, Jackson, White Pigeon and Tecumseh. The material growth of the State continued to increase, proportionally more rapidly than even the population, which now amounted to about 212,000.

John S. Barry succeeded Gov. Gordon in the executive chair, serving from 1841 to 1845. In 1842 the university was opened for the reception of students, and the number of pupils attending the common schools was officially reported to be nearly 58,000. In 1843 a land office was established at Marshall, for the whole State. In 1844 the taxable property of the State was found to be in value $28,554,282, the tax being at the rate of two mills on the dollar. The expenses of the State were only $70,000, while the income from the two railroads was nearly $300,000. In 1845 the number of inhabitants in the State had increased to more than 300,000.

Alpheus Felch served as Governor from 1845 to 1847. During his time the two railroads belonging to the State were sold to private corporations,—the Central for $2,000,000, and the Southern for $500,000. The exports of the State amounted in 1846 to $4,647,608. The total capacity of vessels enrolled in the collection district at Detroit was 26,928 tons, the steam vessels having 8,400 and the sailing vessels 18,528 tons, the whole giving employment to 18,000 seamen. In 1847 there were 39 counties in the State, containing 435 townships; and 275 of these townships were supplied with good libraries, containing in the aggregate 37,000 volumes.

In the spring of 1846, on the account of northern and eastern immigration into Texas, with tastes and habits different from the native Mexicans, a war was precipitated between the United States and Mexico; and for the prosecution of this war Michigan furnished a regiment of volunteers, commanded by Thomas W. Stockton, and one independent company, incurring a total expense of about $10,500. March 3, 1847, Gov. Felch resigned to accept a seat in the U. S. Senate, when the duties of his office devolved upon Wm. L. Greenly, under whose administration the Mexican war was closed.

There are few records extant of the action of Michigan troops in the Mexican war. That many went there and fought well are points conceded; but their names and country of nativity are hidden away in U. S. archives where it is almost impossible to find them.

The soldiers of this State deserve much of the credit of the memorable achievements of Co. K, 3d Dragoons, and Cos. A, E, and G of the U. S. Inf. The two former of these companies, recruited in this State, were reduced to one-third their original number.

In May, 1846, our Governor was notified by the War Department of the United States to enroll a regiment of volunteers, to be held in readiness for service whenever demanded. At his summons 13 independent volunteer companies, 11 of infantry and two of cavalry, at once fell into line. Of the infantry four companies were from Detroit, bearing the honored names of Montgomery, Lafayette, Scott and Brady upon their banners. Of the remainder Monroe tendered two, Lenawee county three, St. Clair, Berrien and Hillsdale each one, and Wayne county an additional company. Of these alone the veteran Bradys were accepted and ordered into service. In addition to them 10 companies, making the First Regiment of Michigan Volunteers, springing from various parts of the State, but embodying to a great degree the material of which the first volunteers was formed, were not called for until October following. This regiment was soon in readiness and proceeded to the seat of war.

Epaphroditus Ransom was Governor from 1847 to November, 1849. During his administration the Asylum for the Insane was established at Kalamazoo, and also the Institute for the Blind, and the Deaf and Dumb, at Flint. Both these institutions were liberally endowed with lands, and each entrusted to a board of five trustees. March 31, 1848, the first telegraph line was completed from New York to Detroit.

John S. Barry, elected Governor of Michigan for the third time, succeeded Gov. Ransom, and his term expired in November, 1851. While he was serving this term a Normal school was established at Ypsilanti, which was endowed with lands, placed in charge of a Board of Education, consisting of six persons; a new State constitution was adopted, and the great "railroad conspiracy" case was tried. This originated in a number of lawless depredations upon the property of the Michigan Central Railroad Company, terminating with the burning of their depot at Detroit in 1850. The next year 37 men were brought to trial, and 12 of them were convicted. The prosecution was conducted by Alex. D. Fraser, of Detroit, and the conspirators were defended by Wm. H. Seward, of New York. Judge Warner Wing presided.

Robert McClelland followed Barry as Governor, serving until March, 1853, when he resigned to accept the position of Secretary of the Interior, in the cabinet of President Pierce. Lieut.-Gov. Andrew Parsons consequently became Acting Governor, his term expiring in November, 1854.

In the spring of 1854, during the administration of Acting Gov. Parsons, the "Republican party," at least as a State organization, was first formed in the United States "under the oaks" at Jackson, by anti-slavery men of both the old parties. Great excitement prevailed at this time, occasioned by the settling of Kansas and the issue thereby brought up whether slavery should exist there.

For the purpose of permitting slavery there, the "Missouri compromise" (which limited slavery to the south of $36^{\circ} 30'$) was repealed, under the lead of Stephen A. Douglas. This was repealed by a bill admitting Kansas and Nebraska into the Union as Territories, and those who were opposed to this repeal measure were in short called "anti-Nebraska" men. The epithets "Nebraska" and "anti-Nebraska" were temporarily employed to designate the slavery and anti-slavery parties, pending the dissolution of the old Democratic and Whig parties and the organization of the new Democratic and Republican parties. At the next State election Kinsley S. Bingham was elected by the Republicans Governor of Michigan, and this State has ever since then been under Republican control, the State officers of that party being elected by majorities ranging from 5,000 to 55,000. And the people of this State generally, and the Republicans in particular, claim that this commonwealth has been as well taken care of since 1855 as any State in the union, if not better, while preceding 1855 the Democrats administered the government as well as any other State, if not better.

As a single though signal proof of the high standard of Michigan among her sister States, we may mention that while the taxes in the New England States, New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania average $10.09 per capita, while in Massachusetts the average is $17.10 per inhabitant, and while in the West the average is $6.50, in Michigan it is only $4.57. At the same time it is generally believed even by the citizens of sister States, that Michigan is the best governed commonwealth in the Union.

Kinsley S. Bingham was Governor from 1854 to 1858. The most notable event during his administration was the completion of the ship canal at the falls of St. Mary, May 26, 1855. An act of Congress was approved, granting to the State of Michigan 750,000 acres of land for the purpose of constructing this canal. The "sault," or rapids, of the St. Mary, have a fall of 17 feet in one mile. The canal is one mile long, 100 feet wide and about 12 feet deep. It has two locks of solid masonry. The work was commenced in 1853 and finished in May, 1855, at a cost of $999,802. This is one of the most important internal improvements ever made in the State.

Moses Wisner was the next Governor of Michigan, serving from 1858 to November, 1860, at which time Abraham Lincoln was elected President of the United States. National themes began to grow exciting, and Michigan affairs were almost lost in the warring elements of strife that convulsed the nation from center to circumference with a life-and-death struggle.

Austin Blair was the 13th Governor of Michigan, serving during the perilous times of rebellion from 1861 to 1865, and by his patriotic and faithful execution of law and prompt aid of the general Government, earning the well deserved title of "the War Gov-error." The particulars of the history of this State in connection with that war we will reserve for the next section.

Henry H. Crapo succeeded Gov. Blair, serving one term. He was elected during the dark hours just before the close of the war, when he found the political sky overcast with the most ominous clouds of death and debt. The bonded debt of the State was $3,541,149.80, with a balance in the treasury of $440,047.29. In the single year just closed the State had expended $823,216.75, and by the close of the first year of his term this indebtedness had increased more than $400,000 more. But the wise administration of this Governor began materially to reduce the debt and at the same time fill the treasury. The great war closed during the April after his election, and he faithfully carried out the line of policy inaugurated by his predecessor. The other prominent events during his time of office are systematically interwoven with the history of the various institutions of the State, and they will be found under heads in their respective places.

Henry P. Baldwin was Governor two terms, namely, from January, 1868, to the close of 1872. The period of his administration was a prosperous one for the State. In 1869 the taxable valuation of real and personal property in the State amounted to $400,000,000, and in 1871 it exceeded $630,000,000.

During Gov. Baldwin's time a step was taken to alter the State constitution so as to enable counties, townships, cities and incorporated villages, in their corporate capacity, to aid in the construction of railroads. Bonds had been issued all over the State by these municipalities in aid of railroads, under laws which had been enacted by the Legislature at five different sessions, but a case coming before the Supreme Court involving the constitutionality of these laws, the Bench decided that the laws were unconstitutional, and thus the railroads were left to the mercy of "soul-less" corporations. Gov. Baldwin, in this emergency, called an extra session of the Legislature, which submitted the desired constitutional amendment to the people; but it was by them defeated in November, 1870.

The ninth census having been officially published, it became the duty of the States in 1872 to make a re-apportionment of districts for the purpose of representation in Congress. Since 1863 Michigan had had six representatives, but the census of 1870 entitled it to nine.

During the last two years of Gov. Baldwin's administration the preliminary measures for building a new State capitol engrossed much of his attention. His wise counsels concerning this much-needed new building were generally adopted by the Legislature, which was convened in extra session in March, 1872.

Ample provision having been made for the payment of the funded debt of the State by setting apart some of the trust-fund receipts, and such portion of the specific taxes as were not required for the payment of interest on the public debt, the one-eighth mill tax for the sinking fund was abolished in 1870.

The fall of 1871 is noted for the many destructive conflagrations in the Northwest, including the great Chicago fire. Several villages in this State were either wholly or partially consumed, and much property was burned up nearly all over the country. This was due to the excessive dryness of the season. In this State alone nearly 3,000 families, or about 18,000 persons, were rendered houseless and deprived of the necessaries of life. Relief committees were organized at Detroit, Grand Rapids and elsewhere, and in a short time $462,106 in money and about $250,000 worth of clothing were forwarded to the sufferers. Indeed, so generous were the people that they would have given more than was necessary had they not been informed by the Governor in a proclamation that a sufficiency had been raised.

The dedication of the soldiers' and sailors' monument at Detroit, April 9, 1872, was a notable event in Gov. Baldwin's time. This grand structure was designed by Randolph Rogers, formerly of Michigan, and one of the most eminent of American sculptors now living. The money to defray the expenses of this undertaking was raised by subscription, and persons in all parts of the State were most liberal in their contributions. The business was managed by an association incorporated in 1868. The monument is 46 feet high, and is surmounted by a colossal statue of Michigan in bronze, 10 feet in height. She is represented as a semi-civilized Indian queen, with a sword in her right hand and a shield in her left. The dedicatory lines in front are: "Erected by the people of Michigan, in honor of the martyrs who fell and the heroes who fought in defense of liberty and union." On the monument are many beautiful designs. At the unveiling there was a large concourse of people from all parts of the State, and the address was delivered by ex-Governor Blair.

John J. Bagley succeeded to the governorship Jan. 1, 1873, and served two terms. During his administration the new capitol was principally built, which is a larger and better structure for the money than perhaps any other public building in the United States. Under Gov. Bagley's counsel and administration the State prospered in all its departments. The Legislature of 1873 made it the duty of the Governor to appoint a commission to revise the State constitution, which duty he performed to the satisfaction of all parties, and the commission made thorough work in revising the fundamental laws of this commonwealth.

Charles M. Croswell was next the chief executive of this State, exercising the functions of the office for two successive terms, 1877-'81. During his administration the public debt was greatly reduced, a policy adopted requiring State institutions to keep within the limit of appropriations, laws enacted to provide more effectually for the punishment of corruption and bribery in elections, the State House of Correction at Ionia and the Eastern Asylum for the Insane at Pontiac were opened, and the new capitol at Lansing was completed and occupied. The first act of his second term was to preside at the dedication of this building. The great riot of 1877 centered at Jackson. During those two or three fearful days Gov. Croswell was in his office at Lansing, in correspondence with members of the military department in different parts of the State, and within 48 hours from the moment when the danger became imminent the rioters found themselves surrounded by a military force ready with ball and cartridge for their annihilation. Were it not for this promptness of the Governor there would probably have been a great destruction of property, if not also of life.

At this date (February, 1881), Hon. David H. Jerome has just assumed the duties of the executive chair, while all the machinery of the Government is in good running order and the people generally are prosperous.

WAR OF THE REBELLION.

As soon as the President called for troops to suppress the Rebellion in April, 1861, the loyal people of the Peninsular State promptly responded and furnished the quota assigned. Austin Blair, a man peculiarly fitted for the place during the emergency, was Governor, and John Robertson, Adjutant General. The people of Michigan have ever since been proud of the record of these two men during the war, but this does not exclude the honor due all the humble soldiery who obediently exposed their lives in defense of the common country. Michigan has her full share of the buried dead in obscure and forgotten places all over the South as well as in decent cemeteries throughout the North. It was Michigan men that captured Jeff. Davis, namely: the 4th Cavalry, under Col. B. F. Pritchard; and it was Michigan men that materially aided in the successful capture of Wilkes Booth, the assassin of the martyred Lincoln.

The census of this State for 1860 showed a population of 751,110. The number of able-bodied men capable of military service was estimated in official documents of that date at 110,000. At the same time the financial embarrassment of the State was somewhat serious, and the annual tax of $226,250 was deemed a grievous burden. But such was the patriotism of the people that by Dec. 23, 1862, an aggregate of 45,569 had gone to battle, besides 1,400 who had gone into other States and recruited. By the end of the war Michigan had sent to the front 90,747, or more than four-fifths the estimated number of able-bodied men at the beginning!

PUBLIC-SCHOOL SYSTEM.

Michigan has as good a public-school system as can be found anywhere in the Union. Ever since 1785 the acts of Congress, as well as the acts of this State since its organization, have encouraged popular education by land grants and liberal appropriations of money. The 16th section of each township was early placed in the custody of the State for common-school purposes, and all the proceeds of the sale of school lands go into the perpetual fund. In 1842 the superintendent of public instruction reported a discrepancy of over $22,000 in the funds, owing to imperfect records, probably, rather than dishonesty of officials. Sept. 30, 1878, the primary-school fund amounted to $2,890,090.73, and the swamp-land school fund to $361,237.20.

The qualification of teachers and the supervision of schools were for many years in the hands of a board of three inspectors, then the county superintendency system was adopted for many years, and since 1875 the township system has been in vogue. The township Board of School Inspectors now consists of the township clerk, one elected inspector and a township superintendent of schools. The latter officer licenses the teachers and visits the schools.

In 1877 the school children (5 to 20 years of age) numbered 469,504; the average number of months of school, 7.4; number of graded schools, 295; number of school-houses, 6,078, valued at $9,190,175; amount of two-mill tax, $492,646.94; district taxes, $2,217,961; total resources for the year, $3,792,129.59; total expenditures, $3,179,976.06.

STATE UNIVERSITY.

By an act of Congress in 1804, a township of land was to be reserved in the territory now constituting the lower peninsula "for the use of seminaries of learning;" but the most of this reservation in 1841 went to a Catholic institution at Detroit. In 1824, through the exertions of Austin E. Wing, delegate to Congress, Gov. Woodbridge and others, a second township was granted, with permission to select the sections in detached localities, and about this time Judge Woodward devised that novel and extensive scheme for the "catholepistemiad," elsewhere referred to in this volume. In 1837 the Legislature established the University at Ann Arbor, and appropriated the 72 sections to its benefit; 916 acres of this land were located in what is now the richest part of Toledo, O., from which the University finally realized less than $18,000!

But the State in subsequent years made many liberal appropriations to this favorite institution, until it has become the greatest seat of learning west of New England, if not in all America. It is a part of the public-school system of the State, as tuition is free, and pupils graduating at the high schools are permitted to enter the freshman class of the collegiate department. It now has an average attendance of 1,200 to 1,400 students, 450 of whom are in the college proper. In 1879 there were 406 in the law department, 329 in the medical, 71 in pharmacy, 62 in dental surgery and 63 in the homeopathic department. There are over 50 professors and teachers. The University is under the control of eight regents, elected by the people, two every second year. Rev. Henry B. Tappan, D. D., was president from 1852 to 1863, then Erastus O. Haven, D. D., LL. D., to 1869, then Prof. H. S. Frieze (acting) until 1871, since which time the reins have been held by Hon. James B. Angell, LL. D.

The value of the buildings and grounds was estimated in 1879 at $319,000, and the personal property at $250,000.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL.

John D. Pierce, the first superintendent of public instruction, in his first report to the Legislature, urged the importance of a normal school. In this enterprise he was followed by his successors in office until 1849, when Ira Mayhew was State Superintendent, and the Legislature appropriated 72 sections of land for the purpose; and among the points competing for the location of the school, Ypsilanti won, and in that place the institution was permanently located. The building was completed and dedicated with appropriate ceremonies Oct. 5, 1852; next year the Legislature appropriated $7,000 in money, for expenses. Prof. A. S. Welch, now President of Iowa Agricultural College, was elected the first principal. In October, 1859, the building with contents was burned, and a new building was immediately erected. In 1878 the main building was enlarged at an expense of $43,347. This enlargement was 88x90 feet, and has a hall capable of seating 1,200 persons. The value of buildings and other property at the present time is estimated at $111,100. Number of students, 616, including 144 in the primary department.

Each member of the Legislature is authorized by the Board of Education to appoint two students from his district who may attend one year free of tuition; other students pay $10 per annum. Graduates of this school are entitled to teach in this State without re-examination by any school officer.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGE.

The Michigan Agricultural College owes its establishment to a provision of the State constitution of 1850. Article 13 says, "The Legislature shall, as soon as practicable, provide for the establishment of an agricultural school." For the purpose of carrying into practice this provision, legislation was commenced in 1855, and the act required that the school should be within 10 miles of Lansing, and that not more than $15 an acre should be paid for the farm and college grounds. The college was opened to students in May, 1857, the first of existing agricultural colleges in the United States. Until the spring of 1861 it was under the control of the State Board of Education; since that time it has been under the management of the State Board of Agriculture, created for the purpose.

THE CAPITOL, AT LANSING.

In its essential features of combining study and labor, and of uniting general and professional studies in its course, the college has remained virtually unchanged from the first. It has had a steady growth in number of students, in means of illustration and efficiency of instruction.

An act of Congress, approved July 2, 1862, donated to each State public lands to the amount of 30,000 acres for each of its Senators and Representatives in Congress, according to the census of 1860, for the endowment, support and maintenance of at least one college where the leading object should be, without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to agriculture and the mechanic arts. The Legislature accepted this grant and bestowed it upon the Agricultural College. By its provisions the college has received 235,673.37 acres of land. These lands have been placed in market, and about 74,000 acres sold, yielding a fund of $237,174, the interest of which at seven per cent. is applied to the support of the college. The sale is under the direction of the Agricultural Land Grant Board, consisting of the Governor, Auditor General, Secretary of State, State Treasurer, Attorney General and Commissioner of the State Land Office.

The Agricultural College is three miles east of Lansing, comprising several fine buildings; and there are also very beautiful, substantial residences for the professors. There are also an extensive, well-filled green-house, a very large and well-equipped chemical laboratory, one of the most scientific apiaries in the United States, a general museum, a museum of mechanical inventions, another of vegetable products, extensive barns, piggeries, etc., etc., in fine trim for the purposes designed. The farm consists of 676 acres, of which about 300 are under cultivation in a systematic rotation of crops.

OTHER COLLEGES.

At Albion is a flourishing college under the control of the Methodist Episcopal Church. The grounds comprise about 15 acres. There are three college buildings, each three-stories high, having severally the dimensions of 46 by 80, 40 by 100, and 47 by 80 feet. The attendance in 1878 was 205. Tuition in the preparatory and collegiate studies is free. The faculty comprises nine members. The value of property about $85,000.

Adrian College was established by the Wesleyan Methodists in 1859, now under the control of the "Methodist Church." The grounds contain about 20 acres. There are four buildings, capable of accommodating about 225 students. Attendance in 1875 was 179; total number of graduates for previous years, 121; 10 professors and teachers are employed. Exclusive of the endowment fund ($80,000), the assets of the institution, including grounds, buildings, furniture, apparatus, musical instruments, outlying lands, etc., amount to more than $137,000.

Hope College, at Holland, is under the patronage of the Dutch Reformed Church. It was begun in 1851, and in connection with the ordinary branches of learning, it has a theological department. In 1877 it had 10 professors and teachers and 110 pupils. Up to 1875 there had graduated, in the preparatory department, begun in 1863, 95; in the academic, beginning in 1866, 53; and in the theological, beginning in 1869, 24. Value of real estate, $25,000; of other property, above incumbrance, about $10,000; the amount of endowment paid in is about $56,000.

Kalamazoo College, headed by Baptists, is situated on a five-acre lot of ground, and the property is valued at $35,000; investments, $88,000. There are six members of the faculty, and in 1878 there were 169 pupils.

Hillsdale College was established in 1855 by the Free Baptists. The "Michigan Central College," at Spring Arbor, was incorporated in 1845. It was kept in operation until it was merged into the present Hillsdale College. The site comprises 25 acres, beautifully situated on an eminence in the western part of the city of Hillsdale. The large and imposing building first erected was nearly destroyed by fire in 1874, and in its place five buildings of a more modern style have been erected. They are of brick, three stories with basement, arranged on three sides of a quadrangle. Their size is, respectively, 80 by 80, 48 by 72, 48 by 72, 80 by 60, 52 by 72, and they contain one-half more room than the original building. Ex-Lieut.-Gov. E. B. Fairfield was the first president. The present president is Rev. D. W. C. Durgin, D. D. Whole number of graduates up to 1878, 375; number of students in all departments, 506; number of professors and instructors, 15; productive endowment, about $100,000; buildings and grounds, $80,000; library, 6,200 volumes.

Olivet College, in Eaton county, is a lively and thorough literary and fine-art institution, under the joint auspices of the Presbyterian and Congregational denominations. Value of buildings and grounds, about $85,000. Fourteen professors and teachers are employed, and the attendance in 1878 was 190, the sexes in about equal proportion. There are five departments, namely: the collegiate, preparatory, normal, music and art.

Battle Creek College, conducted by the Seventh-Day Adventists, was established in 1874, with four departments, 11 professors and teachers, and an attendance of 289. It is practically connected with a large health institution, where meat and medicines are eschewed. In 1878 there were 15 instructors and 478 students. Special attention is paid to hygiene and hygienic medication.

Grand Traverse College was opened at Benzonia in 1863, as the result of the efforts of Rev. Dr. J. B. Walker, a prominent divine of the Congregational Church. The friends of this institution have met with serious discouragements: their lands have not risen in value as anticipated and they have suffered a heavy loss from fire; but the college has been kept open to the present time, with an average of 70 pupils. The curriculum, however, has so far been only "preparatory." The land is valued at $25,000, and the buildings, etc., $6,000. The school has done a good work in qualifying teachers for the public schools.

Besides the foregoing colleges, there are the German-American Seminary in Detroit, a Catholic seminary at Monroe, the Michigan Female Seminary at Kalamazoo, the Military Academy at Orchard Lake, near Pontiac, and others.

CHARITABLE INSTITUTIONS.

No State in the union takes better care of her poor than does Michigan. For a number of years past, especially under the administrations of Govs. Bagley and Croswell, extraordinary efforts have been made to improve and bring to perfection the appointments for the poor and dependent.

According to the report of the Board of State Commissioners for the general supervision of charitable, penal, pauper and reformatory institutions for 1876, the total number in poor-houses of the State was 5,282. For the five years preceding, the annual rate of increase was four times greater than the increase of population during that period; but that was an exceptionally "hard" time. The capacity of the public heart, however, was equal to the occasion, and took such measures as were effectual and almost beyond criticism for the care of the indigent.

At the head of the charity department of the State stands

THE STATE PUBLIC SCHOOL.

In the year 1870 a commission appointed by the Governor for that purpose, visited many of the poor-houses in the State, and found a large number of children in them under 16 years of age, indiscriminately associated with idiots, maniacs, prostitutes and vagrants. Their report recommended the classification of paupers, and especially, that children in the county houses, under 16 years, should be placed in a State school. The act establishing the school was passed in 1871, in conformity with the recommendation. As amended in 1873, it provides, in substance, that there shall be received as pupils in such school all neglected and dependent children that are over four and under 16 years of age, and that are in suitable condition of body or mind to receive instruction, especially those maintained in the county poor-houses, those who have been deserted by their parents, or are orphans, or whose parents have been convicted of crime. It is declared to be the object of the act to provide for such children temporary homes only, until homes can be procured for them in families. The plans comprehend the ultimate care of all children of the class described, and it is made unlawful to retain such children in poor-houses when there is room for them in the State Public School. Dependent orphans and half orphans of deceased soldiers and sailors have the preference of admission should there be more applications than room. Provision is made for perserving a record of the parentage and history of each child.

The general supervision of the school is delegated to a Board of Control, consisting of three members, who are appointed by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Board appoints the superintendent, officers and teachers of the school. One officer is appointed to look up homes for the children, to apprentice them, and to keep a general oversight of them by visitation or correspondence. To complete the work of this institution, an agent is appointed in each county.

The internal government of this school is that known as the "family" and "congregate" combined, the families consisting of about 30 members each, and being under the care of "cottage managers," ladies whom the children call "aunties," and who are supposed to care for the children as mothers. Each child of sufficient years is expected to work three hours every day; some work on the farm, some in the dining-room and kitchen, while others make shoes, braid straw hats, make their own clothing, work in the bakery, engine room, laundry, etc. They are required to attend school three to five hours a day, according to their ages, and the school hours are divided into sessions to accommodate the work.

The buildings, 10 in number, comprise a main building, eight cottages and a hospital, all of brick. The buildings are steam heated, lighted with gas and have good bathing facilities. There are 41 acres of land in connection with the school, and the total value of all the property is about $150,000, furnishing accommodations for 240 children.

STATE REFORM SCHOOL.

This was established at Lansing in 1855, in the northeastern portion of the city, as the "House of Correction for Juvenile Offenders," having about it many of the features of a prison. In 1859 the name was changed to "The State Reform School." The government and discipline have undergone many and radical changes until all the prison features have been removed except those that remain in the walls of the original structure, and which remain only as monuments of instructive history. No bolts, bars or guards are employed. The inmates are necessarily kept under the surveillance of officers, but the attempts at escape are much fewer than under the more rigid regime of former days. This school is for the detention, education and reformation of boys between the ages of eight and 16 years, who are convicted of light offenses.

The principal building is four-stories high, including basement, and has an extreme length of 246 feet, the center a depth of 48 feet, and the wings a depth of 33 feet each. Besides, there are two "family houses," where the more tractable and less vicious boys form a kind of family, as distinguished from the congregate life of the institution proper. The boys are required to work a half a day and attend school a half a day. A farm of 328 acres belonging to the school furnishes work for many of the boys during the working season. Some are employed in making clothing and shoes for the inmates. The only shop-work now carried on is the cane-seating of chairs; formerly, cigars were manufactured here somewhat extensively. There is no contract labor, but all the work is done by the institution itself.

The number of inmates now averages about 200, and are taken care of by a superintendent and assistant, matron and assistant, two overseers and six teachers.

INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB, AND THE BLIND.

This is located at Flint, 60 miles nearly northwest of Detroit. The act establishing it was passed in 1848, and the school was first opened in 1854, in a leased building. It is a school in common for deaf mutes and the blind, rather from motives of economy than from any relation which the two classes bear to one another. The buildings were commenced in 1853. The principal ones now are: front building, 43 by 72 feet, with east and west wings, each 28 by 60 feet; center building, 40 by 60, and east and west wings, each 50 by 70 feet; main school building, 52 by 54, with two wings, each 25 by 60 feet. All of these buildings are four stories high; center of the front building is five stories, including basement. There are also a boiler and engine house, barns, etc., etc. The total value of the buildings is estimated at $358,045, and of the 88 acres of land occupied, $17,570.

The number of inmates has increased from 94 in 1865 to 225 in 1875. Including the principal, there are 10 teachers employed in the deaf and dumb department, and four in the blind, besides the matron and her assistants. Tuition and board are free to all resident subjects of the State, and the trustees are authorized to assist indigent subjects in the way of clothing, etc., to the amount of $40 a year. An annual census of all deaf mutes and blind persons in the State is officially taken and reported to the overseers of the poor, who are to see that these unfortunate members of the human family are properly cared for.

ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, AT KALAMAZOO.

This institution was established in 1848, and now consists of two departments, one for males and the other for females. The capacity of the former is 280 and of the latter 300 patients. In their general construction both buildings are arranged in accordance with the principles laid down by the Association of Medical Superintendents of American Institutions for the Insane. The buildings are of brick, with stone trimmings, and are very substantial, as well as beautiful. The entire cost of both buildings, with all the auxiliary structures, and 195 acres of land, is about $727,173.90. The buildings were constructed during the war and immediately afterward. The asylum was opened in 1859 for the care of patients, and up to Oct. 1, 1875, there had been expended for the care and maintenance of patients, exclusive of the cost of construction, $994,711.32. Indigent patients are received and treated at the asylum at the expense of the counties to which they belong, on the certification of the county authorities, the average cost of maintenance being about $4.12½ per week. Pay patients are received when there is room for them, the minimum price of board being $5 per week.

EASTERN ASYLUM FOR THE INSANE, AT PONTIAC.

These large, beautiful and very modern structures are located upon a farm of upward of 300 acres, and were erected in 1873-'6 at a cost of about $400,000. The general plans are similar to those at Kalamazoo. They are built of brick, with stone window caps, belt-courses, etc. There are accommodations for not less than 300 patients.

Michigan pursues a very enlightened policy toward the chronic insane. Provisions have been made for the treatment even of the incurable, so that as much good as possible may be done even to the most unfortunate. The design is to cure whenever the nature of the mental malady will permit; but failing this, to cease no effort which could minister to the comfort and welfare of the patient.

PENAL INSTITUTIONS.

The Detroit House of Correction, although a local institution, is used to a considerable extent as an intermediate prison, to which persons are sentenced by the courts throughout the State for minor offenses. Women convicted of felonies are also sentenced to this place. The whole number in confinement at this prison for the past decade has averaged a little over 400 at any one time, more males than females. The average term of confinement is but a little more than two months, and the institution is very faithfully conducted.

The State Prison at Jackson is one of the best conducted in the Union. The total value of the property is valued at $552,113. The earnings of the prison in 1878 were $92,378; number of prisoners; 800. Their work is let to contractors, who employ 450 men at different trades. A coal mine has been recently discovered on the prison property, which proves a saving of several thousand dollars per annum to the State. The earnings of this prison since Gen. Wm. Humphrey has been warden (1875) has exceeded its current expenses.

The State Prison at Ionia was established a few years ago for the reception of convicts whose crimes are not of the worst type, and those who are young, but too old for the Reform School. The ground comprises 53 acres of land, 13½ of which is enclosed by a brick wall 18 feet high. Estimated value of property, $277,490; current expenses for 1878, $45,744; earnings for 1878, $5,892; number of prisoners Dec. 31, 1878, 250; number received during the year, 346.

THE STATE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY is distinct from the State Agricultural Board, the latter being simply an executive over the Agricultural College under the laws of the State. The former was organized at Lansing March 23, 1849, and was specially incorporated by act of April 2 following, since which time it has numbered among its officers and executive members some of the foremost men of the State. It has held annual fairs in various places, and the number of entries for premiums has risen from 623 to several thousand, and its receipts from $808.50 to $58,780. The premiums offered and awarded have increased proportionally.

STATE POMOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

At an informal meeting of several gentlemen in Grand Rapids Feb. 11, 1870, it was resolved to organize a State pomological society, and at an adjourned meeting on the 26th of the same month, the organization was perfected, and the first officers elected were: H. G. Saunders, President; S. L. Fuller, Treasurer; and A. T. Linderman, Secretary. The society was incorporated April 15, 1871, "for the purpose of promoting the interest of pomology, horticulture, agriculture, and kindred sciences and arts." During the first two years monthly meetings were required, but in 1872 quarterly meetings were substituted. It now has a room in the basement of the new capitol. T. T. Lyon, of South Haven, is President, and Charles W. Garfield, of Grand Rapids, Secretary. Under the supervision of this society, Michigan led the world in the centennial exposition at Philadelphia in the exhibition of winter apples. The contributions of this society to pomological literature are also richer than can be found elsewhere in the United States.

STATE FISHERIES.

Very naturally, the denser population of the white race, as it took possession of this wild country, consumed what they found already abundant long before they commenced to renew the stock. It was so with the forests; it was so with the fish. An abundance of a good variety of fish was found in all our rivers and little lakes by the early settlers, but that abundance was gradually reduced until these waters were entirely robbed of their useful inhabitants.

Scarcely a thought of re-stocking the inland waters of this State was entertained until the spring of 1873, when a board of fish commissioners was authorized by law; and while the people generally still shook their heads in skepticism, the board went on with its duty until these same people are made glad with the results.

Under the efficient superintendency of Geo. H. Jerome, of Niles, nearly all the lakes and streams within the lower peninsula have been more or less stocked with shad, white-fish, salmon or lake trout, land-locked or native salmon, eel, etc., and special efforts are also made to propagate that beautiful and useful fish, the grayling, whose home is in the Manistee and Muskegon rivers. Much more is hoped for, however, than is yet realized. Like every other great innovation, many failures must be suffered before the brilliant crown of final success is won.

The value of all the property employed in fish propagation in the State is but a little over $4,000, and the total expenses of conducting the business from Dec. 1, 1876, to July 1, 1877, were $14,000.

The principal hatcheries are at Detroit and Pokagon.

THE MICHIGAN STATE FIREMEN'S ASSOCIATION

was organized April 13, 1875, at Battle Creek, for "the protection and promotion of the best interests of the firemen of Michigan, the compilation of fire statistics, the collection of information concerning the practical working of different systems of organization; the examination of the merits of the different kinds of fire apparatus in use, and the improvement in the same; and the cultivation of a fraternal fellowship between the different companies in the State." The association holds its meetings annually, at various places in the State, and as often publish their proceedings, in pamphlet form.

STATE BOARD OF PUBLIC HEALTH.

This Board was established in 1873, and consists of seven members, appointed by the Governor, the secretary ex officio a member and principal executive officer. It is the duty of this Board to make sanitary investigations and inquiries respecting the causes of disease, especially of epidemics; the causes of mortality, and the effects of localities, employments, conditions, ingesta, habits and circumstances on the health of the people; to advise other officers in regard to the location, drainage, water supply, disposal of excreta, heating and ventilation of any public building; and also to advise all local health officers concerning their duties; and to recommend standard works from time to time on hygiene for the use of public schools. The secretary is required to collect information concerning vital statistics, knowledge respecting diseases and all useful information on the subject of hygiene, and through an annual report, and otherwise, as the Board may direct, to disseminate such information among the people. These interesting duties have been performed by Dr. Henry B. Baker from the organization of the Board to the present time. The Board meets quarterly at Lansing.

THE LAND OFFICE

of this State has a great deal of business to transact, as it has within its jurisdiction an immense amount of new land in market, and much more to come in. During the fiscal year ending Sept. 30, 1877, the total number of acres sold was 50,835.72, for $87,968.05, of which $69,809.54 was paid in hand. At that time the amount of land still owned by the State was 3,049,905.46, of which 2,430,050.47 acres were swamp land, 447,270.89 primary school, 164,402.55 Agricultural College, 310.26 University, 160 Normal School, 2,115.63 Salt Spring, 1,840 Asylum, 32.40 State building, 3,342.75 asset, and 380.31 internal improvement. But of the foregoing, 1,817,084.25 acres, or more than half, are not in market.

STATE LIBRARY.

Territorial Library, 1828-1835.—The first knowledge that we have of this library, is derived from the records found in the printed copies of the journals and documents of the Legislative Councils of the Territory, and in the manuscript copies of the executive journals.

The library was established by an act of the Legislative Council, approved June 16, 1828, authorizing the appointment of a librarian by the Governor, with the advice and consent of the Council.

The librarian so appointed was required to take an oath of office and give bond to the treasurer of the Territory in the sum of $1,000, for the faithful performance of his duties; his time of service was for two years or until another be appointed.

The librarian was also required to take charge of the halls and committee room, and other property appertaining to the Legislative Council. He was also required to make an annual report to the Council, upon the state of the library, and upon all such branches of duty as might from time to time be committed to his charge. For his services he was to receive annually the sum of $100.

The library seemed to have been kept open only during the actual sittings of the Legislative Council.

The executive journal by its records shows that under the provisions of this act, William B. Hunt was appointed librarian July 3, 1828, by Gov. Lewis Cass, for the term of two years. Mr. Hunt continued to act as librarian until March 7, 1834, when Gersham Mott Williams was appointed by Gov. Porter. Mr. Williams seems to have acted as librarian until the organization of the institution as a State library.

The honored names of Henry B. Schoolcraft, Charles Moran, Daniel S. Bacon, Calvin Brittain, Elon Farnsworth, Charles C. Has-call and others are found in the list of the members of the Library committee.

March, 1836, the State library was placed in charge of the Secretary of State; in February, 1837, it was given to the care of the private secretary of the Governor; Dec. 28 following its custody was given to the Governor and Secretary of State, with power to appoint a librarian and make rules and regulations for its government. C. C. Jackson acted as the first librarian for the State. Lewis Bond also had the care of the books for a time. Oren Marsh was appointed librarian in 1837, and had the office several years. In March, 1840, the law was again changed, and the library was placed in the care of the Secretary of State, and the members of the Legislature and executive officers of the State were to have free access to it at all times.

State Library.—The library was of course increased from time to time by Legislative appropriations. In 1844, as the result of the efforts of Alexandre Vattemare, from Paris, a system of international exchanges was adopted.

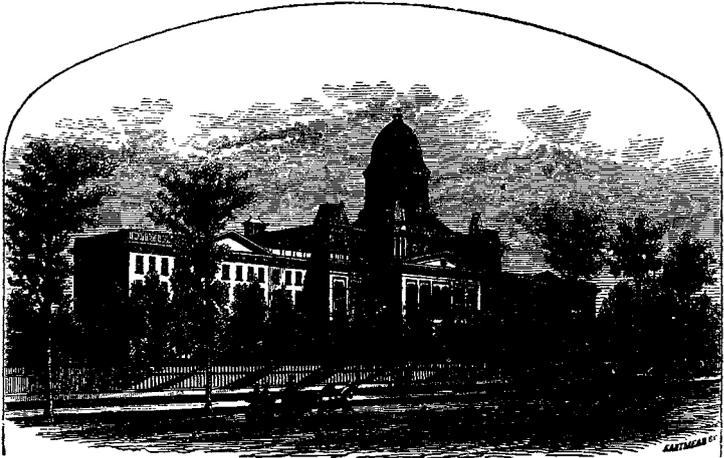

April 2, 1850, an act was passed requiring the Governor to appoint a State librarian with the consent of the Senate, and it was made the duty of the librarian to have the sole charge of the library. This act, with some amendments, still remains in force. It requires the librarian to make biennial reports and catalogues. The librarians under this act have been: Henry Tisdale, April 2, 1850, to Jan. 27, 1851; Charles J. Fox, to July 1, 1853; Charles P. Bush, to Dec. 5, 1854; John James Bush, to Jan. 6, 1855; DeWitt C. Leach, to Feb. 2, 1857; George W. Swift, to Jan. 27, 1859; J. Eugene Tenney, to April 5, 1869; and Mrs. Harriet A. Tenney to the present time. This lady has proved to be one of the best librarians in the United States. She has now in her charge about 60,000 volumes, besides thousands of articles in the new and rapidly growing museum department. She is also Secretary of the "Pioneer Society of the State of Michigan," and has charge of the books, papers and relics collected by that society. The library and these museums are now kept in the new State capitol at Lansing, in a series of rooms constructed for the purpose, and are all arranged in the most convenient order and with the neatest taste.

BANKS.

The earliest effort for the establishment of a bank within the present limits of the State of Michigan was in 1805. The act of Congress establishing the Territory of Michigan conferred legislative powers on the Governor and judges; and at their first session as a Board, a petition for an act incorporating a bank was presented to them. This was at a time when the local business could scarcely have demanded a banking institution, or have afforded much promise of its success. The small town of Detroit had just been laid in ashes, and the population of the entire Territory was inconsiderable.

ble, being reckoned five years previously at only 551; in 1810, it was less than 5,000; the country was possessed mainly by the Indians, and the few French in the State were neither enterprising nor prosperous. No road pierced the forests of the interior; no manufactories existed; agriculture yielded nothing for market, and navigation had scarcely begun to plow our rivers and lakes. In general commerce the fur trade was almost the only element.

The petition for a bank charter was presented, not by citizens of Detroit, but by capitalists of Boston, Russell Sturges and others, who were engaged in the fur trade. This petition was granted Sept. 15, 1806, incorporating the "Bank of Detroit," with a capital of $400,000. The great distance of this locality from New England gave those capitalists the advantage of circulating inland bills of credit against their Western banks for a long time before their redemption. Judge Woodward, one of the judges who granted the act of incorporation, was appointed its president, and the bank went into immediate operation; but imputations unfavorable to Judge Woodward in regard to this and other matters led to a Congressional investigation of the act incorporating the bank, and the act was disapproved by that body. The bank, however, continued to do business; but in September, 1808, the Governor and judges, in the absence of Woodward, passed an act making it punishable as a crime to carry on an unauthorized banking business, and this put an end to the brief existence of the institution. Its bills were quietly withdrawn from circulation the following year.

The next bank established in the Territory was the "Bank of Michigan," incorporated by the Board of Governor and Judges, Dec. 19, 1817, with a capital of $100,000. The validity of this act was fully established by the courts in 1830. By the terms of its charter, the corporation was to expire on the first Monday in June, 1839; but the Legislative Council, Feb. 25, 1831, extended its life twenty-five years longer, and subsequently it was allowed to increase its capital stock and establish a branch at Bronson, now Kalamazoo.

The two above named are all the banks which derived their corporate existence from the Governor and judges.

The first bank charter granted by the "Legislative Council" was to the Merchants' and Mechanics' Bank of Michigan," approved April 2, 1827. The bank was to be established at Detroit, with a capital of $200,000, with liberty to increase it to $500,000. This corporation was also made an insurance company; but it does not appear a company was ever organized under this charter. March 29, 1827, the "Bank of Monroe" was incorporated, its capital stock to be $100,000 to $500,000, and to continue in existence 20 years. The "Farmers' and Mechanics' Bank of Michigan" was chartered Nov. 5, 1829, and March 7, 1834, it was allowed to increase its capital stock, and establish a branch at St. Joseph. The "Bank of River Raisin" was chartered June 29, 1832, and allowed to have a branch at Pontiac. The "Bank of Wisconsin" was chartered Jan. 23, 1835, and was to be located in the Green Bay country, but on the organization of the State of Michigan it was thrown outside of its jurisdiction.

March 26, 1835, there were incorporated four banks, namely: "Michigan State Bank" at Detroit, "Bank of Washtenaw" at Ann Arbor, "Bank of Pontiac," and the "Erie and Kalamazoo Railroad Bank" at Adrian. The "Bank of Pontiac" was also a railroad bank, its establishment being an amendment to the charter of the "Detroit and Pontiac Railroad Company."

The nine banks last above named are all that were created by the "Legislative Council."

Next, the State Legislature in 1836 chartered the Bank of Manhattan, Calhoun County Bank, Bank of St. Clair, Bank of Clinton, Bank of Ypsilanti, Bank of Macomb, Bank of Tecumseh and Bank of Constantine. The same Legislature passed "an act to create a fund for the benefit of the creditors of certain moneyed corporations," which was in fact the famous safety-fund system of the State of New York. It required each bank to deposit with the State Treasurer, at the beginning of each year, a sum equal to one-half of one per cent. on the capital stock paid in; and the fund so created was to be held and used for the benefit of the creditors whenever any bank subject to its provisions should become insolvent; but this statute was destined to have but little practical effect. The system in New York proved inadequate for the security of the public interests, and it was practically abandoned here.

By this time, the financial affairs of the whole country had become sadly deranged, consequent upon a wild and reckless spirit of speculation. The currency became greatly inflated, fabulous prices given to property, and the masses of the people subjected to the cruel mercies of shrewd financiers. The session of 1837 was flooded with petitions for the creation of banks, and the Legislature met the emergency by adopting a system of free banking, under which were organized a great number of those institutions since known as "wild-cat banks." The statute authorized any 12 freeholders of any county who desired to do banking, to apply to the treasurer and clerk of the county for that purpose, and books were to be opened for subscriptions to the capital stock, $50,000 to $300,000. Ten per cent. on each share was required to be paid in specie at the time of subscribing, and 30 per cent. of the entire capital stock in like funds before the association should commence operations. The president and directors were also required to furnish securities for the payment of all debts and redemption of all notes issued by the association.

This new law was popularly received with great enthusiasm. On its final passage in the House, only four members were bold enough to vote against it, namely: Almy, of Kent; Monfore, of Macomb; Purdy, of Washtenaw, and Felch of Monroe. This Legislature closed its session March 22, 1837, by adjournment to Nov. 9, following; but the financial embarrassments of the country increased so rapidly that the Governor called an extra session of the Legislature for June 12, and in his message he attributed these embarrassments, in a great measure, to the error of over-banking, over-trading, and a want of providence and economy. The banks east and south had already suspended specie payments, and Michigan was of necessity drawn into the vortex. The report, to this Legislature, by a special commissioner appointed by the Governor, held forth, however, that the banks of Michigan were solvent, but that a little time may be granted them as a defense against the results of suspensions in New York and elsewhere. The number of banks doing business in this State at that time was 13 in number, previously mentioned. The Legislature granted them time until May 16, 1838. The session of the winter following undertook to secure the public by appointing three bank commissioners to visit all the banks in the State at least once in every three months, to examine the specie held by them, inspect their books, and inform themselves generally of their affairs and transactions; monthly statements of the condition of the banks were required to be made and published, and no bills were to be issued without bearing the endorsement of a bank commissioner, etc. Under the general banking law, as already stated, every subscriber to the stock was to pay in 10 per cent. in specie on each share at the time of subscribing, and 10 every six months thereafter, and 30 per cent. of the whole capital stock was required to be paid in like manner before the bank should commence operations. The specie thus paid in was to be the capital of the bank and the basis of its business operations. The requirement of it involved the principle that banking could not be carried on without bona-fide capital, and without it no bank could be permitted to flood the country with its bills; but the investigations of the commissioners showed a very general violation of the law in this respect. In many cases, instead of specie, a kind of paper denominated "specie certificates" was used; in some cases, specie borrowed for the occasion was used and immediately returned to the owner; sometimes, even, a nail-keg filled with old iron, or gravel, or sand and covered over the top with specie, was employed to deceive the commissioners; and sometimes the notes of individual subscribers or others, usually denominated "stock notes," were received and counted as specie. The books of the banks were also kept in so imperfect a manner, sometimes through incompetency, sometimes with fraudulent design, as frequently to give little indication of the transactions of the bank or of the true condition of its affairs. By proprietorship of several banks in one company of men, by frequent sale and transfer of the stock, and by many other tricks and turns, a little specie was made to go a great way in flooding the country with worthless paper.

It is manifest that this condition of things could not have existed without a fearful amount of fraud and perjury. In the excitement and recklessness of the times, amid ruined fortunes and blighted hopes, the moral sense had become callous. The general banking law was not without some good features, but it came into existence at a most unfortunate time, and the keenness and unscrupulousness of desperate men, taking advantage of its weak points and corruptly violating its salutary provisions, used it to the public injury.

Under this law about 40 banks went into operation, many of them in remote and obscure places, and before the commissioners could perfect their work of reform the crisis came and the catastrophe could not be averted. Failure rapidly succeeded failure, and legitimately chartered banks were drawn into the same vortex with the "wild-cat" institutions. Only seven banks escaped the whirlpool, and the worthless paper afloat represented more than a million dollars. As ex-Gov. Alpheus Felch well says:

"Thus ends the history of that memorable financial epoch. Forty years have passed since these events, and few remain who can remember the excitement and distrust, the fear and despondency, the hopes and disappointments which agitated the community, in those days of inflation and speculation, of bankruptcy and financial distress; and fewer still remain who bore part in the transactions connected with them. We look back upon them to read the lessons which their history teaches. The notion that banks without real capital, or a currency which can never be redeemed, can relieve from debts or insolvency, is tried and exploded. We are led to the true principle, that prosperity, both public and individual, awaits upon industry and economy, judicious enterprise and honest productive labor, free from wild speculation and unprofitable investments, and a wise and prudent use of our abundant resources."

In 1875 there were 77 national banks in this State, doing an annual business of about $26,000,000; 15 State banks, with a business of nearly $4,000,000, and 12 savings banks, with a business of $6,000,000.

GEOLOGY.

The lower peninsula occupies the central part of a great synclinal basin, toward which the strata dip from all directions, and which are bounded on all sides by anticlinal swells and ridges. The limits of this basin exceed those of the peninsula, extending to London, Ont., Madison, Wis., Marquette and Sault Ste. Marie. The whole series of strata may therefore be compared to a nest of dishes, the lower and exterior ones representing the older strata.

The upper peninsula is divided by the Marquette-Wisconsin anticlinal into two geological areas, the eastern belonging to the great basin above alluded to, and the western being lacustrine in its character, and largely covered by Lake Superior. The southern rim of the latter is seen uplifted along Keweenaw Point and the south shore of the lake, and these strata re-appear at Isle Royale.

Between the Michigan and lacustrine basins the metalliferous Marquette-Wisconsin axis interposes a separating belt of about 50 miles.

The palæozoic great system of this State measures about 2,680 feet in thickness, of which the Silurian division is 920 feet, the Devonian 1,040 feet, and the carboniferous 720 feet.

The coal-bearing group occupies the central portion of the peninsula, extending from Jackson to township 20 north, and from range 8 east to 10 west.

Of iron, hematite and magnetite, in immense lenticular masses of unsurpassed purity, abound in the Huronian rocks of the upper peninsula. The former of these, under the action of water, becomes soft, and is called Limonite, and is abundant throughout the State as an earthy ore or ochre, bog ore, shot ore, yellow ochre, etc. Sometimes it is deposited in stalactitic, mammillary, botryoidal and velvety forms of great beauty. Kidney ore abounds in the Huron clays, and "black-band" in the coal measures.

Of copper, native, in the "trap" of Lake Superior, abounds in the form of sheets, strings and masses. Gold, silver and lead are also found in unimportant quantities in the Lake Superior region.

Salt abounds in the Saginaw region, gypsum, or "land plaster" in the vicinity of Grand Rapids, building stone throughout the State, manganese in many places, and many other valuable earths, ores and varieties of stone in many places.

NEWSPAPERS.

There are about 275 newspapers and periodical publications in Michigan, of all classes. Of these 224 are published weekly, 17 daily and weekly, two daily, seven semi-weekly, one tri-weekly, four semi-monthly, 19 monthly, one quarterly, and one yearly; 112 are Republican, 46 Democratic, 73 independent and neutral, 14 religious, and 15 miscellaneous. Among the latter are two Methodist, seven Adventist (two Dutch or Hollandisch), one Episcopal, one Catholic and one Baptist; four mining, five educational, one Masonic, one Odd-Fellow, one Grange, three medical and one agricultural. Five are printed in the German language, six in the Dutch, one in the Swedish and one in the Danish.

The present population of Michigan, according to the census of 1880, is as follows: Male, 862,278; females, 774,057; native born, 1,247,989; foreign, 388,346; white, 1,614,087; colored, 22,248; total, 1,636,335.

TOPOGRAPHY.

Michigan is a little southeast of the center of the continent of North America, and with reference to all the resources of wealth and civilization is most favorably situated. It is embraced between the parallels of 41°.692 and 47°.478 north latitude, and the meridians of 82°.407 and 90°.536 west of Greenwich. The upper peninsula has its greatest extent east and west, and the lower, north and south. The extreme length of the upper peninsula is 318 miles, and its extreme breadth, 164½ miles; its area, 22,580 square miles. The length of the lower peninsula is 277 miles, its width, 259 miles, and its area, 33,871 square miles. The upper peninsula is rugged and rocky, affording scarcely anything but minerals as a source of wealth; the lower is level, covered with forests of valuable timber, and is excellent for all the products of Northern States.

The total length of the lake shore is 1,620 miles, and there are over 5,000 smaller lakes in the States, having a total area of 1,114 square miles.

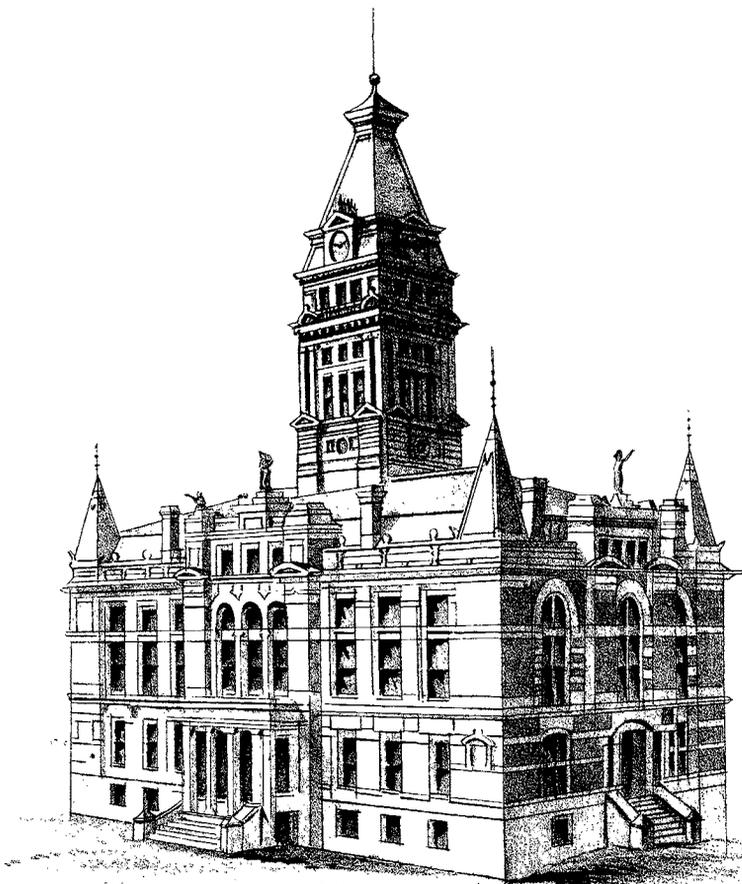

A RETROSPECT.

And now, how natural to turn our eyes and thoughts back to the log-cabin days of less than 50 years ago, and contrast it with the elegant mansion of modern times. Before us stands the old log cabin. Let us enter. Instinctively the head is uncovered in token of reverence to this relic of ancestral beginnings and early struggles. To the left is the deep, wide fire-place, in whose commodious space a group of children may sit by the fire and up through the chimney may count the stars, while ghostly stories of witches and giants, and still more thrilling stories of Indians and wild beasts, are whisperingly told and shudderingly heard. On the great crane hang the old tea-kettle and the great iron pot. The huge shovel and tongs stand sentinel in either corner, while the great andirons patiently wait for the huge back log. Over the fire-place hangs the trusty rifle. On the right side of the fire-place stands the spinning-wheel, while in the further end of the room the loom looms up with a dignity peculiarly its own. Strings of drying apples and poles of drying pumpkin are overhead. Opposite the door by which you enter stands a huge deal table; by its side the dresser whose "pewter plates" and "shining delf" catch and reflect "the fire-place flame as shields of armies do the sunshine." From the corner of its shelves coyly peep out the relics of former china. In a curtained corner and hid from casual sight we find the mother's bed, and under it the trundle-bed, while near them a ladder indicates the loft where the older children sleep. To the left of the fire-place and in the corner opposite the spinning-wheel is the mother's work-stand. Upon it lies the Holy Bible, evidently much used, its family record telling of parents and friends a long way off, and telling, too, of children

Scattered like roses in bloom,
Some at the bridal, and some at the tomb.

Her spectacles, as if but just used, are inserted between the leaves of her Bible, and tell of her purpose to return to its comforts when cares permit and duty is done. A stool, a bench, well notched and whittled and carved, and a few chairs complete the furniture of the room, and all stand on a coarse but well-scoured floor. Let us for a moment watch the city visitors to this humble cabin. The city bride, innocent but thoughtless, and ignorant of labor and care, asks her city-bred husband, "Pray what savages set this up?" Honestly confessing his ignorance, he replies, "I do not know." But see the pair on whom age sits "frosty but kindly." First, as they enter they give a rapid glance about the cabin home, and then a mutual glance of eye to eye. Why do tears start and fill their eyes? Why do lips quiver? There are many who know why, but who that has not learned in the school of experience the full meaning of all these symbols of trials and privation, of loneliness and danger, can comprehend the story that they tell to the pioneer? Within this chinked and mud-daubed cabin, we read the first pages of our history, and as we retire through its low doorway, and note the heavy battened door, its wooden hinges, and its welcoming latch-string, is it strange that the scenes without should seem to be but a dream? But the cabin and the palace, standing side by side in vivid contrast, tell the story of this people's progress. They are a history and prophecy in one.

COURT HOUSE.

HISTORY OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

IN THE BEGINNING.

Three-fourths of a century has passed away since the Territory of Michigan was organized. At that time that portion which now constitutes the county of Washtenaw, one of the fairest and best in the State or nation, was an unbroken wilderness, inhabited only by the wily savage, who roamed at will over the beautiful plains and through the heavy forests, fishing in the waters of the Huron, Raisin or Saline rivers, or hunting the game that everywhere abounded, seemingly caring nothing for the morrow, and only living in the ever present. The thought of the "pale faces" penetrating this beautiful country and demanding it, in the name of civilization, or of might, which it is asserted by some, makes right, had probably never entered their mind. A short time only was to elapse before the inexorable demands of the whites must be met. The original inhabitants of the land must again proceed toward the setting sun. All nature must be changed. The fair plains, with their beautiful flowers, painted only by the hand of God, must be broken up by the husbandman, and grain fit for the use of civilized man sown therein; forests were to be felled and clearings made that the art of man could be exercised in the building and adornment of homes. Thus it was in 1823, when John Bryan, Daniel Cross and Benjamin Woodruff settled in the neighborhood of the present flourishing city of Ypsilanti. The soil was unwearyed by the plow, and the woodman's ax had scarcely been heard. The cabin of the settler, with its smoke curling heavenward, and with an air inviting the weary traveler to come and rest, was not to be seen, nor even the faintest trace of civilization; but instead, boundless emerald seas and luxuriant groves.

These the gardens of the deserts—these
The unshorn fields, boundless and beautiful,
And fresh as the young earth, ere man had sinned.

Lo! they stretch
In airy undulations far away
As if the ocean in the gentlest swell
Stood still, with all his rounded billows fixed,
And motionless forever.

The openings and prairies were decked with beautiful flowers, of which it may truly be said that "Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these." The pleasant groves, unobstructed by undergrowth through which might be seen the fleet-footed deer, the cunning fox and other wild animals, who as yet had not been taught to fear man; the waters of the beautiful Huron, clear as crystal, winding in and out, now being kissed by the sun as its sparkling rays were sent down, now hid by the heavy forest; the beautiful lakes, nestling among the hills,—all these made a picture worthy the hand of the most noted artist, and caused the men that have been named, as well as all others who for several years from time to time visited this favored spot, to behold and wonder. Truly the name of Washtenaw—grand, beautiful—was worthily bestowed upon the county.

FIRST WHITE MEN IN WASHTENAW COUNTY.

History neither records nor does tradition speak of this section of country being visited by white men until the time of the early French explorers,—Father Segard, in 1632; Father Marquette, in 1673; and Robert de La Salle, in 1679. The latter circumnavigated the lower peninsula of Michigan, and, in prospecting along its borders, may have wended his adventurous way through old Washtenaw. After the settlement of Detroit in 1701, by a French colony, the speculative fur-traders who trafficked with the Indians, and the Jesuit missionaries, who had a zealous regard for the spiritual welfare of the aborigines, whom they endeavored to convert to Christianity, often tracked over the hills and vales of this county. In 1805 the Territory of Michigan was formed, and four years later the first successful settlement was effected in Washtenaw county, at the present city of Ypsilanti, by the French traders, Godfrey, Pepin and Le Shambre. At this time the entire population of the Territory was less than 4,000 souls, and eighty per cent. of these were French. Then came the war of 1812. After the fall of Detroit, General Harrison made an attempt to recover it from the British, or at least to protect the frontier settlements in Monroe county and its contiguity, which included the settled portions of what is now Washtenaw. He sent General Winchester with a force of 1,000 men to this section, and on the 22d of January, 1813, he was attacked by a superior force of British and Indians, under General Proctor, at Frenchtown, on the River Raisin. General Winchester was made prisoner and his troops surrendered, upon guarantee by the British commander, of protection from the Indians. In utter disregard of these stipulations, Proctor withdrew his white troops to Malden, when, all restraint being removed, his dusky allies indiscriminately massacred the prisoners. This affair is known in history as the "Battle of the Raisin." After the death of Tecumseh (October 5), at the battle of the Thames, Detroit was recovered, and the Michigan settlements began to breathe freer, and have less apprehension of Indian onslaughts. Peace was declared Dec. 24, 1814.

The first Government surveys of land in the Territory of Michigan were made in 1816, and two years later they came into market. From this period dates the permanent settlement of the State. The Indian claim to 6,000,000 acres (including Washtenaw) was extinguished by a treaty concluded by General Cass, at Saginaw, in September, 1819, and two years later the "Chicago treaty" obliterated the Indian title to all the remaining lands in the State south of the Grand river. Thus the lands were thrown open to settlement, and the next 10 years were an important decade in the history of Washtenaw county.

The pioneer settlement of Washtenaw, as before stated, was at Ypsilanti, in 1809, when Gabriel Godfrey, a Frenchman, accompanied by Francis Pepin and Louis Le Shambre, established a trading post. The building erected for this purpose stood upon the west bank of the river. At that time, and previously, the Indians regarded these banks of the Huron with special favor, and at Ypsilanti their trails from a wide extent of country intersected. When one knows this country he cannot wonder at the taste of these sons of the forest. It seems to have been neutral ground between the rival tribes. They had a burial place just at the foot of the hill, where they believed they had equipped many a warrior for the conflicts on his way toward the "happy hunting grounds." There was another near, where tradition has it a human victim was once offered in sacrifice. Large quantities of bones, arrows, stone hatchets and ornaments were dug from the ground in that locality. In the year 1811 about 2,500 acres were patented to the foregoing-named traders, under the seal of President Madison, according to an act of Congress applying to such cases. This tract is marked upon the old maps as French claims. At first this post was profitable in a bartering business with the Indians, but after the treaties already alluded to, the Indians were removed so far to the westward that trade and barter grew less and less, until about 1820 it was given up, though the original traders remained most of the time. The place was then known as "Godfrey's, on the Pottawatomie trail."

The next settlement was in the spring of 1823. Benjamin Woodruff, Robert M. Stitts, John Thayer, and David Beverly settled about one mile southeast of the present city of Ypsilanti. This settlement took the name of "Woodruff's Grove," and became a noted point in the early history of this county. Benjamin Woodruff, without doubt, was the first white man to effect a permanent settlement in the county, though his claim is disputed by Eldridge Gee, who made, in 1875, the following statement to John Geddes, which statement was published in the county papers at the time: "I first visited Washtenaw county in 1822, in the month of June, in company with Epaphras Matteson (my father-in-law), Joseph Young and Giles Downer. We started from Mrs. Downer's house on the Rouge. The first night we put up in the French trading house.

We took the river trail and went to where Mill creek runs into the Huron river. We then came back to where Ann Arbor city now is, and from there to Saline, and from thence back to the French trading house, and from thence to Mrs. Downer's. There were no white persons then residing in Washtenaw. The trading house had no occupants. In February, 1823, I moved to Washtenaw county. I hired three men on the Rouge to help me through. We camped out three nights. On the fourth day I got to where I thought I would stop. It was on the east half of the northeast quarter of section 33, township 2 south, 7 east. I first built a shanty of some boards I brought along, and in about six weeks built a house. It was on the 14th of February when I got to where I built."

This statement of Mr. Gee's seems incredible from the fact that none of the early settlers remember the man being there until the spring and summer of 1824. At that day any living within ten miles were considered neighbors, and Mr. Gee could hardly have been so near Woodruff's Grove in the summer and fall of 1823 and it not be known. He was never present at any house-raising at a time when it was difficult to obtain men enough to raise the heavy logs to their places. Again, Mr. Woodruff's claim was well known and never disputed for more than fifty years that he was the first settler.

The founding of a city did not seem to have been thought of by the original settlers; they simply located where experience taught them to expect good fortune.

Jason and Daniel Cross, with their families, were the next settlers after those already mentioned. They arrived in the summer of 1823. The first settlers mostly came up the river by the use of a flat-bottom boat propelled by poles. Soon after the settlement at Woodruff's, two families by the name of Hall settled upon the west side of the river, about opposite the grove, who called themselves "the Kings of the River." In the autumn of 1823, John Bryan and family came in from Geneseo, New York, with the first ox-team which ever came through direct from Detroit.

The settlement at Ann Arbor was in 1824, John Allen and Elisha Walter Rumsey being the first, arriving there in February, 1824. They were followed soon after by Asa L. Smith and others.

These settlements named were the first in Washtenaw county, and the parties named were the pioneers who paved the way for its future greatness. Many of the first settlers found the struggle too severe, sold their improvements and moved elsewhere; but much the larger portion, some in middle life and many in old age, have been gathered to their fathers and are not. A few remain, with silvered locks and palsied frame, waiting for the summons to "come up higher."

These feeble beginnings were strengthened by many new-comers from the East, so that, by 1830, many new openings had been made, while the older colonies had grown materially, and Washtenaw county had taken a long stride toward the greatness which awaited it in the future.

WASHTENAW—ITS MEANING.

Much interest has been manifested of late years, especially since the organization of the Pioneer Society, as to the meaning of Washtenaw. When the first settlers of the county came in they were told, and confidently believed, it meant "no white people." To these early settlers this meaning seemed very probable. The red men, fleeing from intruders of a different complexion, and finding not far away an upland region where deer were found in herds, where the beaver were abundant, and where the rivers and lakes were full of fish, would naturally give to that region some expression of their deliverance and satisfaction—"No white people." But this definition of the term is not generally accepted. In 1874 J. J. Parshall, of Ann Arbor, addressed a letter to John Todd, of Owosso, and received from R. V. Williams, of that place, the following reply:

Owosso, July 24, 1874.

J. J. Parshall, Esq., Ann Arbor.

DEAR SIR:—Major John Todd handed me your favor to him yesterday, with a request that I should answer it, as his advanced age renders it very difficult for him to write, and also because I more perfectly understand and speak the Indian tongue,—or rather the Chippewa language. I therefore give you the information sought. The word "Washtenaw" is Anglicized from the Indian word Wushtenong, or Wushte-nong, meaning, literally, the Further District or Land Beyond,—Further Country,—Wushte, further, beyond, further on, and nong, country, district, place of. The word used in connection with the subject spoken of conveys somewhat different meanings.

How the name came to be applied to the territory comprising Washtenaw county I am unable to say, although I spoke the Indian language nearly as well as a native before the land was surveyed by the Government. It was never so known or called by the Chippewas (or Ojibwas, as Schoolcraft has it). Washtenong was the country or district of territory watered by the Grand river,—what was known as the Washtenong Seebe, or Sepea. I remain

Respectfully yours,

R. V. WILLIAMS.

In 1877 William M. Gregory, of Saline, wrote to Louis Genereau, on the same subject. The following is Mr. Genereau's answer:

ELBRIDGE, OCEANA Co., MICHIGAN. }
 May 28, 1877. }

SIR:—I have the pleasure to answer your letter dated May 18th. You must excuse me for not answering your note before. I was absent. You wish to know of me what is the meaning of the word "Washtenaw." Well, sir, I have had chance to learn and interpret all these words. Well, sir, that word means a large stream or a large river. This was the name of an Indian who lived near the mouth and had a village, and that was his hunting and fishing ground. Did not allow any one to hunt except his relatives and friends. The Indians used to go back and forth and stop with Washtenaw, and by and by they called the river by his name, "Washtenaw sebey." This was a good many years before the war of 1812. I have an old Indian in my care and he is over one hundred years old, and he was acquainted with Washtenaw. This is all at present.

Respectfully yours,

LOUIS GENEREAU.

Lippincott's Gazetteer, edition of 1855, states that Grand river, Michigan, was called by the Indians Washtenong river. A copy of Genereau's letter was sent to Rev. S. G. Wright, who had been a teacher among the Ojibway Indians, and the following reply was received:

LEECH LAKE, MINNESOTA, June 18, 1877.

DEAR SIR:—Yours of the 9th inst. is just received. I have no doubt now but I have the full sense of the word Washtenaw. The name came, no doubt, in this way: An Indian of the Pottawatomie tribe, who may have resided in early times as far east as Pittsburg, had a son whom he named "Washington," from the great general whom he may have seen or heard of. As white settlements advanced that tribe was pushed westward and settled in Michigan and the west of that State. This boy, now a man, settled on this river and called it after his name, or which may be more likely, it was so called by others, as that is common in the Indian country. Now the terminations, ong, aug, etc., always signify the place of a thing, etc., and so the place of living, or residence of this man, was called Washtenaug, Washtenong, etc. The river Washtenaw sebey and the place would come to have the same name that Washington now has among these Indians, namely, Washtenong, or the place of Washington. I am glad to have got these facts myself and you are welcome to what light I may have added to your stock of knowledge of the question. I remain,

Very truly yours,

S. G. WRIGHT.

It will be seen from the foregoing letters that a difference of opinion exists among those familiar with the Indian tongue. The most probable derivation of the term is that mentioned by Mr. Wright, and associating the Indian idea of Washington, the Father of his country, it may readily be assumed the meaning of the term is Grand.

RIVERS OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

There are four rivers and innumerable small streams coursing through Washtenaw county. Of these the largest and most important is the Huron river, which has its rise in Livingston county and first enters this county on section 6, township 1 south, of range 5 east and passes into section 1, township 1 south, of range 4 east, thence through sections 12, 13, 24 and 25, same town and range, thence through sections 30, 31 and 32, township 1 south, range 5 east, thence through sections 5, 4, 9, 10, 3, 2, 11, 12, 13, township 2 south, range 5 east, thence through sections 7, 17, 16, 21, 28, 27, 26, 35, 36, township 2 south, range 6 east, thence through section 31, township 2 south, range 7 east, thence through sections 5, 4, 9, 16, 15, 22, 23, 24, township 3 south, range 7 east, into Wayne county, emptying into Lake Erie a few miles below the mouth of the Detroit river. The Indians called this river the Cos-scut-e-nong sebee, or Burnt District river; meaning the plains, or oak openings, lands or country. Its tributaries are few for the latter part of its course, though for the first half they are many; each of which, with the main stream, furnish more or less mill privileges, and which are improved for various manufacturing purposes. The Huron is a beautiful, transparent stream, passing alternately through rich bottoms, openings, plains, and sloping woodlands, covered with heavy timber. Its length, by its meanderings, is about ninety miles.

Raisin river heads in Wheatland township, Hillsdale county, and empties into Lake Erie, two and a half miles below Monroe, after passing, in an extremely winding course, through Jackson, Washtenaw, Lenawee and Monroe counties. It is the most serpentine stream of the peninsula. Its course is first northeasterly, then south, then northeasterly, then southeasterly. In a direct line from its head to its mouth, it is sixty miles; but by its meandering, it is not less than one hundred and thirty miles. It is one of the most important streams in the State, affording as much hydraulic power as any other, having high and beautiful banks and an extremely rapid current; the bottom, being a limestone rock, which produces a good quality of building material, is extensively quarried for that purpose. Its name is derived from the dense cluster of grapes which at an early day lined both banks. It passes through the towns of Sharon, Manchester and Bridgewater, in this county.

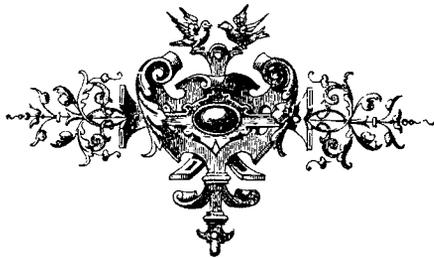

Saline river rises near the center of Washtenaw county, in the township of Lodi, and empties into the River Raisin, in Monroe county. Its course is southeasterly, and its length, in a direct line, twenty miles.

Grand river (Indian name Washtenong) is the largest stream lying wholly within the State of Michigan. Its course from its head branches to its mouth is very serpentine. At its source are two tributaries; the East and South branches. The former takes its rise on the western confines of Sharon township, in Washtenaw county, and the South branch on the northern borders of Wheatland township, in Hillsdale county. They both unite in Jackson county, a little above the city of Jackson. The river then pursues a northerly course to the northern boundary of the county, then westerly for a distance of about eight miles, when it returns to a northerly route, following the boundary line dividing Ingham and Eaton counties; then taking a northwesterly course, crossing the northeast corner of Eaton and southwest corner of Clinton, passing over the eastern part of Ionia; it then strikes a westerly course, passing through Kent, Ionia and Ottawa counties, and enters Lake Michigan fifteen miles south of the mouth of the Muskegon river, 245 miles southwesterly of the strait of Michilimackinac, and 75 miles north of the St. Joseph river. It is 270 miles long, including its windings, and, at its mouth, between 50 and 60 rods wide, and of sufficient depth to admit vessels drawing 12 feet water. It is navigable 240 miles for batteaux, and receives in its course as its principal tributaries, the Rouge, Flat, Maple, Looking-glass and Red Cedar rivers on the northern side, and the Thorn Apple on the southern. It is navigable for steamers 40 miles, to the Grand rapids, below which it has not less than four feet of water. At the rapids a steamboat canal is constructing; and, after it is completed, steamboats may go up to the village of Lyons, at the mouth of the Maple, a distance of 50 miles, without difficulty. The river is subject to freshets, and the intervals, in some places, to inundations, though the high banks generally afford them sufficient protection. At the mouth it is never known to rise more than a foot, but at the rapids it sometimes rises to the height of 15 feet. The country along the river for 20 miles from its mouth is generally level, in some instances swampy, with lofty forests of various kinds of timber, and bearing an almost impenetrable thicket of undergrowth. Proceeding upward, whether deviating to the sources of its numerous tributaries or following the main channel, almost every variety of soil and timber is to be met with; sometimes the fertile prairie or opening, and again the alluvial bottom, and groves of timber. The region of country irrigated by the Grand river and its branches is not less than seven thousand square miles, and includes some of the richest and most valuable lands in the State.

AREA AND POSITION OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

Washtenaw county is bounded on the east by Wayne, on the west by Jackson, on the north by Livingston and Oakland and on the south by Lenawee and Monroe counties. It comprises 20 congressional townships, a total of 720 square miles, or 460,800 acres of land.

CHAPTER II.

ORGANIZATION AND POLITICAL DIVISION.

ORGANIZATION OF THE COUNTY.

The Legislative Council, in 1822, passed an act defining the boundaries of Washtenaw county. On its passage, Lewis Cass, Governor of the Territory, issued the following proclamation:

A PROCLAMATION.

To all whom these presents shall come, greeting:

I have thought it expedient to lay out the following county, that is to say: All the county included within the following boundaries: beginning on the principal meridian, where the line between the townships numbered two and three, north of the base line, intersect the same; thence south to the line between the townships numbered four and five, south of the base line; thence east to the line between the seventh and eighth ranges, east of the principal meridian; thence north to the base line; thence west with the base line, to the line between the sixth and seventh ranges, east of the principal meridian; thence north, to the line between the townships numbered two and three, north of the base line; thence west to the place of beginning; shall form a county to be called the county of Washtenaw.

It is hereby declared that the county herein "laid out," to wit, the county of Washtenaw, shall be organized whenever, hereafter, the competent authority for the time shall so determine, and that until then the said county shall be attached to and compose a part of the county now organized, in the following manner:

The county of Washtenaw shall be attached to and compose a part of the county of Wayne.

In testimony whereof, I have caused these letters to be made patent, and the great seal of the said Territory to be hereunto affixed. Given under my hand, at Detroit, this tenth day of September, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-two, and of the Independence of the United States, the forty-seventh.

LEW. CASS.

At this time there was not a single white person living within the limits of the territory described. As already stated, the first settlement of the county was made the year following, but it was not until 1826 there were found to be a sufficient number of inhabitants in the county for the purpose of organization. At a session of the Legislative Council, held in the fall of that year, the following act was passed:

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, that the county of Washtenaw shall be organized from and after the taking effect of this act, and the inhabitants thereof entitled to all the rights and privileges to which, by law, the inhabitants of other counties of this Territory are entitled.

SEC. 2. That the county court for the county of Washtenaw shall be held on the third Monday of June and the second Monday of January in each year,

SEC. 3. That all suits, prosecutions and other matters now pending before the county court of Wayne county, or before any justice of the peace of said county of Wayne, shall be prosecuted to final judgment and execution, and all taxes heretofore levied and now due shall be collected in the same manner as though the said county of Washtenaw had not been organized.

Sec. 4. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after the 31st day of December, 1826.

Approved November 20, 1826.

Thus it was that the county of Washtenaw was brought into organized existence.

POLITICAL DIVISIONS OF THE COUNTY.

After organization, the first step taken was to divide the county into townships. At a session of the Legislative Council, held in 1827, this was accordingly done, three townships being formed—Ypsilanti, Ann Arbor and Dexter, with boundaries as follows:

All that part of the county included in the surveyed townships one, two, three and four south, in range seven east of the meridian, to be a township by the name of Ypsilanti.

All that part of the county included in the surveyed townships one and two, north of the base line, in range six, and townships one, two, three and four in range six, and townships three and four, in range five, south of the base line, to be a township by the name of Ann Arbor.

All that part of the county included in the following surveyed townships: one and two south, in range five, east of the meridian, and townships one and two, in same range, north of the base line, and all the remaining townships north and south of the base line, in ranges one, two, three and four, shall be a township by the name of Dexter.

These townships were divided up, from time to time, until finally twenty were formed, each congressional township being organized under a separate town government, which government comprises a supervisor, clerk, treasurer, three school inspectors, four justices of the peace, and four constables.

The Town of Lyndon comprises township No. 1 south, of range No. 3 east.

The Town of Dexter comprises township No. 1 south, of range No. 4 east.

The Town of Webster comprises township No. 1 south, of range No. 5 east.

The Town of Northfield comprises township No. 1 south, of range No. 6 east.

The Town of Salem comprises township No. 1 south, of range No. 7 east.

The Town of Sylvan comprises township No. 2 south, of range No. 3 east.

The Town of Lima comprises township No. 2 south, of range No. 4 east.

The Town of Scio comprises township No. 2 south, of range No. 5 east.

The Town of Ann Arbor comprises township No. 2 south, of range No. 6 east.

The Town of Superior comprises township No. 2 south, of range No. 7 east.

The Town of Sharon comprises township No. 3 south, of range No. 3 east.

The Town of Freedom comprises township No. 3 south, of range No. 4 east.

The Town of Lodi comprises township No. 3 south, of range No. 5 east.

The Town of Ypsilanti comprises township No. 3 south, of range No. 7 east.

The Town of Manchester comprises township No. 4 south, of range No. 3 east.

The Town of Bridgewater comprises township No. 4 south, of range No. 4 east.

The Town of Saline comprises township No. 4 south, of range No. 5 east.

The Town of Augusta comprises township No. 4 south, of range No. 7 east.

FIRST ROADS.

It was not until 1825 that a public highway was surveyed through Washtenaw county. Previous to this time, the early settlers followed the Indian trails, or paths, blazed by themselves through the forests. In 1825, Orange Risdon surveyed the road from Detroit to Chicago, entering Washtenaw county on section 1, in the town of Ypsilanti, taking a southwest course and passing through the towns of Ypsilanti, Pittsfield, Saline and Bridgewater, and passing out of the county from section 33 in the latter town. It will be seen this road left out the village of Ann Arbor, the prospective county seat.

The second road was that known as

THE TERRITORIAL ROAD.*

“In the summer of 1829 the opening of a Territorial road through the counties of Washtenaw, Jackson, and westward to the mouth of the St. Joseph river, was the subject of discussion by the people in the counties named. It was known to the parties that the Federal Government was engaged in making the Chicago road a military road from Detroit to Chicago through the southern tier of counties of the Territory. At that time the road leading west through the next tier of counties north, had its western end at Clement’s farm, on section 24, in the township of Lima, in Washtenaw county, some seven or eight miles west of Ann Arbor. Believing that the land and other inducements were as good in the second tier of counties as in the first, an effort was made to have opened a competing road and draw a part of the emigrants to Michigan on a new route; at any rate to give them a choice. Mr. Botsford volunteered to go through from Ann Arbor to the Chicago road and post notices and call the attention of the people on the route to the importance of the subject, if notices were written calling a meeting at Ann Arbor. The offer was accepted, the notices were written, and a meeting was held. It was resolved to petition the Legislative Council at its next session, to appoint commissioners and a surveyor to lay out a road. A petition was circulated and signed, it is believed, by every man on the contemplated route. The act was passed, and Orrin White, of Ann Arbor, Seely Neel, of Superior, and Jonathan F. Stratten were appointed commissioners. Mr. Stratten was surveyor as well as commissioner.

“Early in January, 1830, the commissioners started from ‘Sheldon’s on the Chicago road, and run the line of the new road west. When they reached Ann Arbor, a party of eight volunteered to go on with them to Grand river. Henry Rumsey, Samuel Van Fossen, Zenas Nash, Jr., Wm. Hunt, Edward Clark, Mr. McCarty, Alex. Laverty and J. Bennett were the eight. They had provided themselves with an active yoke of oxen and a lumber wagon, a tent, blankets, provisions, rifles and axes. The object of the volunteers was to open and mark the road as fast as it was surveyed. The two parties kept together and spent the first night on the floor of Samuel Clement’s log house, in Lima. Here we took on all the hay we could, for this was the last settlement. Early the next morning the parties forded Mill creek and pushed forward. The volunteers soon found use for their axes and handspikes in felling trees and rolling them out of the road. The snow was about four inches deep, and the weather was very cold, but good progress was made each day, as the country was sparsely timbered. Each morning after breakfast the teams went forward, and the teamsters would find a camping ground and start a small fire and wait till the parties came up, when the axmen would fell trees and cut them in logs ten or twelve feet long, place skids on the ground and roll three logs on them, then two, then one on top. Care was always taken to build the log heaps so that the wind blew lengthways of the logs. The snow was brushed off the ground and the tents pitched, the blankets spread, and supper prepared and eaten with a relish. The evenings were spent in smoking, telling stories, and playing pranks upon each other. In this way the time was spent till the parties crossed the Grand river at the site of the city of Jackson. This was as far as the volunteers had proposed to go. They found a body of a log house with a roof on it at this place. A Mr. Blackman, one of the commissioners’ party, had ‘entered’ some land here and built this house on it and left it in this incomplete condition. There was no

'chinking,' doorway, nor place for a window. A hole was soon made, and both parties took possession. A rousing fire was soon burning, and the tents and spare blankets were hung up to break off the wind. The parties lay there two nights. The road was brought up to the east bank of the river. It was proposed to give a name to the place. For this purpose, on the second night a 'convention' was organized and Judge Rumsey, one of the volunteers, was unanimously elected president. Here let me say the Judge had served Washtenaw county in the Legislative Council, and was acquainted with parliamentary rules, and was of a genial and mirthful disposition. Soon after the president had taken the 'chair'—a seat on a log—a committee of three was appointed to propose a name for the place. As soon as the committee retired, that is, gone to the other side of the log heap, the president rose with all the dignity he could assume, and spoke in substance as follows: 'Gentlemen of the convention: You have appointed a committee to select a name for this place, and while they are absent permit me to make a few remarks. I am personally acquainted with you all. I know that at home you are gentlemanly in your deportment. You have each of you a nice sense of honor; but I have sometimes observed that when men of good standing at home are among strangers their behavior is strangely at variance with their home conduct. Gentlemen, you represent Ann Arbor, you represent Washtenaw county, and let me beg of you, gentlemen, that on this interesting occasion you will not do anything that shall bring discredit to our village or county. When your committee has proposed the name of this place, and you have adopted it, some one may propose that it be received with cheers. If the cheers are ordered, allow me to request that they may not be given so loud as to disturb the neighbors.' As the nearest neighbor was more than thirty miles off the remark 'brought down the house.' The committee returned and reported the name of Jacksonburg, which was accepted and adopted, and nine as wild cheers were sent up as fifteen men could give.

"One of the party had a violin, and a dance was next in order. Judge Rumsey and Mr. Commissioner Neel, being the oldest men, opened the ball. It soon became evident that there was strife between the dancers and the fiddler which should get ahead. As the dancers wore stoga boots, the fiddler gradually went ahead, but the race was well contested, much to the amusement of the spectators. After taking breath and some refreshments—for this occasion had been anticipated and provided for—dancing was resumed and kept up until the small hours of the morning. That morning the volunteers were to part with the commissioners and their party, and return home. After a few hours' rest all were astir, when, upon inspection, it was found that the volunteers had only about three pints of flour left. They dare not call upon the commissioners for any of their provisions, for they had none to spare. Some water was procured, and the flour was stirred in a frying-pan and partly baked. The cake was divided into eight parts, and each man took his piece and ate it hot. This is all the food the party had to travel thirty odd miles on, and break a track in the snow. As soon as it was light enough to see, 'good-bye' was said, and one party started east and the other west. Of the volunteers two were left with the team having the tent, blankets, axes, etc., the other six started out in single file, each taking his turn to head and break track a mile. On reaching the top of the short hills, Van Fossen and Nash left the party, who moved too slow for them. They started off on a trot and were soon out of sight. When the party reached the pond on the west line of Lima, they found the two men sitting on a log nearly asleep, and badly chilled. It took some time and effort to arouse them. They had hurried on, until they were warmed and fatigued, and sat down to rest. The wind swept across the frozen pond, cold and bleak, and it is probable if the party had not discovered them, that they would have frozen to death. It was long after dark when they were found. The most serious obstacle was the crossing of Mill creek, Lima Center. The water was nearly waist deep, the night was cold. It was between the party and home. There was no going around it. It must be passed, and passed it was, and the pace was increased. Disagreeable as a cold bath is in mid-winter, and unpleasant as it is to have one's clothes frozen on him, no bad effect followed. At Clement's the same stream had to be forded again, but there the water was only knee deep. Some of the party remained at Clement's, and some went on with McCarty to his home. At each place a good warm supper and a night's rest put all right again. The next day all except McCarty reached Ann Arbor in time for dinner. The trip occupied six or eight days.

"In conclusion it may not be improper to say that in the following spring the road was used to such an extent, and so many emigrants moved west of Ann Arbor on it, that the people who had made a home at Jacksonburg concluded that they would celebrate the 4th of July in the good old-fashioned style. Gideon Wilcoxson, of Ann Arbor, gave an eloquent oration. About 70 persons sat down to a good dinner. Capt. Alex. Laverty, who had taken up his residence there, commanded the escort. Ann Arbor furnished the orator, marshal of the day, and part of the committee of arrangements, besides about a dozen citizens. The day was all that could be desired, and every one who took part in the celebration seemed well pleased."

CHAPTER III.

INDIAN INCIDENTS—PIONEER LIFE.

A history which did not give some of the incidents which connect the time when the Indians alone occupied this land and the time when the white race was wholly the possessor, would be incomplete. The incidents that might be given are many, but only a few are here presented.

At the time of the first settlement, and for some years afterward, there were a number of tribes, and parts of tribes, found in it. Even after they were forced to abandon all claim to make their homes in this favored spot, they would occasionally return, often causing great fear among the pioneer settlers. Among the tribes represented were the Ojibwas, Ottawas, Hurons, and Pottawatomies, the latter of whom were the most numerous. These Indians were not destitute of religious ideas, but they were much colored by their superstitions. The Ottawas believed in Michabou, "the great hare," a mythological personage who formed the earth and developed men from animals. In this superstition the reputed doctrine of Darwin finds confirmative proof as to the origin of man. They also believe in Mirachibi, god of the waters, and also in Missabize, "the great tiger." The Chippewas, or more properly the Ojibwas, believed in the Kitché Manitou, the Great or Good Spirit, and the Matchi Manitou, the evil spirit. The Medas was a body acting as a kind of priesthood; but each one had his own Manitou revealed to him in dreams. The great mythological personage among the Ojibwas was Menabojou, who aided the Great Spirit in creating the world.

AN INDIAN LEGEND.

The following is the tradition of the Ojibwas as to the way in which Menabojou assisted in the creation of the world: Menabojou is represented as being in the world all alone, and, being without companionship, he became very lonesome. Searching for a companion, he finally came across a wolf to which he at last became very much attached, and which likewise became very much attached to him, and they called each other brother. They were inseparable companions. In one of the lakes near by was the home of Matchi Manitou. While traveling together one day (Menabojou and his brother) Matchi Manitou enticed the wolf, the brother of Menabojou, into the lake, and he was drowned. Menabojou became very disconsolate at his sad loss, for he was now all alone in the world again, and he determined to be revenged of Matchi Manitou. Passing along the lake one day, in winter, when it was frozen over, the day being sunshiny and warm, he found Matchi Manitou and his chief devils out on the ice sunning themselves. He tried to approach them unobserved so that he could send an arrow in the hated Manitou, but they saw him. They did not know what to think of the strange object—could not tell whether it was an enemy or something harmless. To settle that point Matchi Manitou sent one of his devils in the shape of a bear to see what it was. Menabojou, seeing the movement, assumed a position of perfect rigidity and waited his coming. The devil came cautiously to the object of his search, sniffed the air about it and began to scratch it and bite it. When Menabojou was just on the point of crying out with pain, he quit. He tried it again, and when Menabojou thought he must cry out, he quit again, and then returned to Matchi Manitou and told him that it was only a stump. But he was not entirely satisfied with his report, so he sent out another devil in the shape of a large serpent, with orders to report what the strange object might be. So it came to Menabojou and coiled itself around him with many a fold, and then it began to tighten the folds and squeeze him most fearfully. He was almost ready to cry out with pain when the serpent suddenly relaxed its hold and gave him an opportunity to breathe. Again the folds were drawn so tightly about him that he thought every bone in him would surely be broken, but just when he could stand it no longer the serpent uncoiled itself and returned to Matchi Manitou with the same report that it was only a stump. Satisfied now, they all lay down in the bright sun and went to sleep. When Menabojou saw that his time had come, he crawled up toward them, and when in proper distance, he shot several arrows into the sleeping devils, and then he hastened away to see what they would do when they awoke. When Matchi Manitou awoke and found that a number of his chief devils were dead, he looked around for the strange object and found that it was gone. He then exclaimed: "It was Menabojou!" So Matchi Manitou spewed out a flood of water from his mouth to follow after Menabojou and destroy him. Menabojou, seeing the flood coming, fled to the mountains. The higher he ascended the higher the waters came. He went to the highest peak and the waters followed him there. He then climbed a tree and still the waters did not abate. When he could go no further the waters kept on ascending until they reached his waist and they stood. For three days it was so, and Menabojou was about to give up in despair. On the morning of the third day he saw swimming in the water around him three animals—a beaver, an otter, and a muskrat. He called to them and called them brothers. He said to them, "What shall we do?" and they could not answer him. Then he said to them: "I'll tell you what to do: Each of you dive to the bottom and bring up some earth." Then the beaver did so, but the water was so deep that he was drowned before he reached the bottom. Then the otter tried it, and he succeeded in reaching the bottom, but before he succeeded in getting any earth, he drowned also. Then the muskrat tried it, and just as he succeeded in getting a very little earth, he likewise drowned. Menabojou succeeded in getting hold of the dead bodies of these animals, and he examined the beaver, but found nothing. He examined the otter with no better results. Almost in despair, he examined the muskrat, and in one paw he found a little earth. This he took and carefully held on his hand to dry in the sun. When it was thoroughly dry he pulverized it between his fingers, and then with a strong spurt of breath, he blew it all around him, and immediately the dry land appeared. And this is the way that Menabojou aided Kitchi Manitou in creating the world.

INDIAN ANTIQUITIES.

The first Europeans to visit the wilderness comprising the present State of Michigan were Frenchmen,—Catholic priests, “voyagers,” and “coureurs de bois.” They found the State sparsely inhabited by Indians, mostly having their homes and lodges on the eastern shore of Lake Michigan, in the valley of Grand river, near its mouth, and in the northern woods. The southern part of the State seems to have been a border land—common hunting ground for the Indians of Michigan, and the more powerful tribes on the southern shore of Lake Erie, Northern Ohio and Indiana. The ancestors of the Michigan Indians had formerly resided in the valley of the St. Lawrence, and had gradually been driven west by encroaching tribes. The Indians of Michigan were a happy race, so far as happiness is attainable by savages. The rivers, lakes and streams of the country abounded with fish, easily caught. The dark pine forests of the north and the oak openings and prairies of the south furnished plenty of game,—black bears, wolves, foxes, prairie chickens and wild turkeys. Otter were not uncommon on the banks of our own Huron. Deer were very plenty, and men are now living who have hunted them upon the very ground where now an army of 1,500 students assemble in one of the leading universities of the country. Within 40 years as many as half a dozen deer in a wild state have been seen at one time in what are now the streets of Ann Arbor. In the summer season the Indians took advantage of the waters surrounding the State to make distant excursions in canoes for the purpose of hunting and fishing, peace and war. Their light canoes, carried past the rapids of Sault Ste. Marie, were often launched upon Lake Superior, and others, skirting the shores of Lakes Erie and Ontario, and passing the Great Falls, floated down the St. Lawrence as far as Montreal.

The Indians of Michigan were always faithful to their first white acquaintances, the French, so long as the French had a foothold in Canada or the State. There is a tradition that the Indians of Michigan sent a quota of braves to fight the English during the old French war—that they were present with their allies, the French, on that terrible night in the dead of winter when they attacked and destroyed the unsuspecting village of Schenectady.

While the Michigan Indians were always friendly to the French, they were always hostile, when favorable occasion offered, to the English inhabitants of the country. According to tradition Washington had the grim satisfaction, or doubtful glory, of fighting the Michigan Indians on the disastrous day of Braddock's defeat. They took part in the conspiracy of Pontiac and ever remained faithful to that great chief, who, during his siege of Detroit, more than a century ago, issued promissory notes on birch bark, signed with the figure of an otter, which notes were honestly redeemed with honest coin. They were hostile to us during the Revolution. They gave aid to the British in the war of 1812, and allied themselves with Tecumseh. Many of them prepared to array themselves against us in the late Black Hawk war.

There was at least one American whom the Indians of Michigan came at last to fear and respect. That American was Lewis Cass. In the early days of his presence in the Territory of Michigan, they often attempted to kill him, and as their attempts were always without success, they came to believe that he held a charmed life. His influence with them was unbounded. It has been said that the loaded rifle aimed at the Indian's naked breast had less influence upon his conduct or his emotions than a word or gesture of Gen. Cass.

The Indians of Michigan had no idea of property, except so far as movable articles could be reduced to actual personal possession. In their primitive state they had but little better idea of the manufacturing arts than the bird which builds its nest or the fox which digs its hole. No Michigan Indian ever fashioned a stone battle-ax or clipped a flint arrow-head. He had barely intelligence enough to use these weapons when furnished ready for his hand. Like a great many white men of our day, he had no religion worth speaking of. The common impression that he recognized or worshipped a Great Spirit, or any other spirit than the "crooked" kind, is false and absurd. The preposterous supposition must have originated in the fancy of some enthusiastic poet or the imagination of some credulous missionary. His language had no words to express spiritual thoughts or spiritual things, or any abstract ideas, or the ideas of humility, worship or prayer. Spirit, as distinguished from the gross and most sensuous matter, was as black to his mind as honesty was to the mind of Bill Tweed, or delicate moral sense to the mind of a Fiji Islander! The patient and devoted Elliot, in translating the Bible into the language of the New England Indians, found no words in their tongue to express the simplest idea of God and spiritual things. He only overcame the difficulty by resorting to circumlocutions and irreverent symbols which would excite the astonishment of an intelligent Christian of to-day, or by coining words which would drive the brain of the toughest German philologist into a dizzy whirl. However unpleasant it may be in the light of reason and criticism, the "noble red men" of the poet must degenerate into the ignoble red brute of science, but little removed, in many respects, above the "beasts of the field." He was insensible to the moral emotions. He knew neither terror nor shame. His sexual instinct was that of a brute. The divine passion of love, that pure respect and affection for the opposite sex, not based upon low and selfish ideas, was foreign to his nature. The leading motive that influences the brute is hunger. This, coupled with the baser motive of revenge, was the principal motive which influenced the Indian.

THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

Although the seat of the Black Hawk war was several hundred miles west, yet it had its influence on the settlements in this county, not because it ever reached this country, but because of anticipations that it would. It was thought that when the Indians under Black Hawk were brought into action by the troops which were sent against them when they crossed the Mississippi river, if they were defeated, they would strive to make their way into Canada; and if they did that, they were most likely to follow the trail which ran through the county. This was cause for considerable excitement and no little amusement at that day among the settlers. But the result of the war showed that these fears were entirely groundless; for, instead of being driven into this region, they were forced into Wisconsin, and the great Sac and Fox chief captured.

But this outcome of the war did not prevent the settlers from making necessary preparations for the emergency, should it come. The natural desire for safety and protection, on the part of the settlers, was heightened when they knew that hostilities had broken out, from the fact that the Ottawas and Pottawatomies had asserted that "when the leaves on the trees are as large as squirrels' ears, the Sacs intended to invade the settlements, and kill the white settlers." An Independent Rifle Company was organized at Dexter, its members not being confined alone to citizens of the village, but were scattered over a considerable portion of the surrounding country. The regiment to which this company was attached was commanded by Col. J. D. Davis, who lived at Plymouth, and that place was the headquarters of the regiment. Says a local writer:

"One bright May morning, in 1832, at about eight o'clock, a man was seen riding on horseback in great haste over the hill, from toward Ann Arbor. As he rode into the village he met the commander of this company on the street, and in an excited manner announced that the Indians under Black Hawk had made war upon the whites and were marching toward Detroit, murdering every man, woman and child they could find; that they were at White Pigeon Prairie 80,000 strong at that moment, and would soon be upon us, at the same time delivering to the Captain of the company a military order signed by Col. Davis, and dated at Plymouth at six p. m. of the previous day, which was couched substantially in the following language:

HEADQUARTERS 1ST REG'T MICH. RIFLE CORPS, }
PLYMOUTH, May 9, 1832, 6. P. M. }

Captain Dexter Rifles:

SIR:—You are hereby commanded to be and appear with your full company armed and equipped as the law dictates, for actual service, at Ten Eyck's tavern, 10 miles west of Detroit, on the Chicago turnpike, on to-morrow, May 10, at 10 o'clock A. M., then and there to meet the regiment and other military forces, to march at once against the Black Hawk Indians.

By order of Major General John R. Williams, commanding Michigan Forces.

J. D. DAVIS,

Colonel 1st Regiment Michigan Rifles.

“The bearer of this order was George Warner. It was now May 10, at half past eight o'clock A. M. In order to obey this order literally, the company must be assembled (with some of them nine miles away) and marched on foot, for there was no conveyance, 40 miles, in just an hour and a half. That, of course, was impossible, and strange as it may seem at this distance of time, that company were called together, and at just two o'clock that afternoon every member was in the ranks with rifle and blanket, and in less than 30 minutes they took up their line of march to the stirring music of fife and drum. They actually marched to Ypsilanti that same evening, where they rested until the morning light, when they again took up their line of march toward Detroit, and at about 11 o'clock A. M. they met the forces under Gen. John R. Williams, about four miles west of Ten Eyck's, on the march, westward, ho! to meet the enemy. Here the company joined the advancing army, and returned over the same road they had traversed in the early part of the day.

“By the time the troops had reached Saline the reports of the whereabouts of the enemy began to be quite conflicting, so much so that the troops halted there for two days, when authentic information was received that Black Hawk was captured in Wisconsin, his forces dispersed, and the Indian war ended. The Michigan troops were therefore disbanded and permitted to return to their homes.

“The Dexter Rifles returned after an absence of six days, but during its absence the inhabitants of the village and surrounding country had become very much excited and alarmed. They had held counsel together and resolved to build a block house of the saw-logs that lay upon the mill yard upon the west side of the creek, as a place of safety for the women and children, and other works of defense were to be erected. In fact, so great was the consternation, it was said (with how much truth I cannot vouch), that one man, owning a farm but a short distance from the village, with a small lake upon it, actually sunk his farming utensils in the lake, in order that the Indians should not destroy them.”

PIONEER LIFE.

One of the most interesting phases of national or local history is that of the settlement of a new country. What was the original state in which the pioneer found this country? How was it made to blossom like the rose? These are questions propounded by almost every individual of the country in which he makes his home, or sojourn for a time. Pioneer life in Washtenaw county finds its parallel in almost every county in the State, and throughout the entire West. In addition to what is given in the State history, in this volume, we add the following items:

When John Bryant, Daniel Cross, Benjamin Woodruff and others of that noble band of pioneers settled here, they found an unbroken wilderness. Wild beasts, and but little less wild savages, roamed at will over the rolling prairies, through the dense forests, and along the waters of the Raisin, Saline, and the "beautiful Huron." Forests were to be felled, cabins erected, wells built, and the rivers and creeks made to labor for the benefit of mankind; the beautiful prairies were to be robbed of their natural ornaments, and the hand of art was to assist in their decoration. Who was to undertake this work? Are they qualified for the task? What will be the effect of their labors upon future generations?

The Washtenaw county pioneers had many difficulties to contend with, not the least of which was the journey from civilization to their forest homes. The route lay for the most part through a rough country; swamps and marshes were crossed with great exertion and fatigue; rivers were forded with difficulty and danger; nights were passed on the open prairies, with "old mother earth" for a couch, and the starry heavens for a shelter; long weary days and weeks of travel were endured, but finally their eyes were gladdened, and their hearts beat faster when a vision of the "promised land" burst on their view.

For several years the early settlers of Washtenaw county were compelled to go to Detroit for their flour or meal, requiring almost a week's time to make the journey.

The fever and ague, or "chills and fever," was a disease of which every pioneer was required to have a taste.

The first thing upon arrival was to set about building the cabin. While this was being done the family slept in their wagons or upon the grass, while the horses or mules, hobbled to prevent escape, grazed the prairie around them. Trees of a suitable and uniform size were selected, felled and prepared for their places. The day for the raising is announced, and from far and near come other pioneers to assist in this labor. The structure goes up, a log at a time, those engaged stopping now and then to "wet up their whistles," and soon it is ready for the clapboard roof, which was held on by huge weight poles. A door and a window is cut where the "good wife" directs, a chimney built, and the building is ready for the occupants. It is not a model home, but it is the beginning of a great prosperity, and as such is worthy of preservation in history, on account of its obscurity and its severe economy. The window was very small, sometimes glass being inserted, but often covered with greased paper. The door was made of spliced clapboards and hung with wooden hinges. It was opened by pulling a leather latch-string, which raised a wooden latch inside the door. For security at night this latch-string was pulled in, but for friends and neighbors, and even strangers, the "latch-string hangs out" was always a sign of welcome.

These simple cabins were inhabited by a kind and true-hearted people. They were strangers to mock modesty, and the traveler seeking lodgings for the night, or desirous of spending a few days in the community, if willing to accept the rude offering, was always welcome, although how they were disposed of at night the reader may not easily imagine, for, as described, a single room was made to serve the purpose of kitchen, dining-room, sitting-room and parlor, and many families consisted of eight to ten members.

Next came the work of preparing the soil for agricultural purposes. Spring comes and the ground is prepared for the seed. The father takes his post at the plow, and the daughter takes possession of the reins. This is a grand scene—one full of grace and beauty. The pioneer girl thinks but little of fine dress; knows less of the fashions; has probably heard of the opera, but does not understand its meaning; has been told of the piano, but has never seen one; wears a dress "buttoned up behind;" has on leather boots, and "drives plow" for father.

The character of the pioneers of Washtenaw county falls properly within the range of the historians. They lived in a region of exuberant fertility, where nature had scattered her blessings with her liberal hand. The beautiful Huron river winding its serpentine way to the lake, the inexhaustible forest supply, the fertile prairie, and the many improvements constantly going forward, and the bright prospect for a glorious future in everything that renders life pleasant, combined to deeply impress their character, to give them a spirit of enterprise, an independence of feeling, and a joyousness of hope. They were a thorough admixture of many nations, characters, languages, conditions and opinions. There was scarcely a State in the Union that was not represented among the early settlers. All the various religious sects had their advocates. All now form one society. Says an early writer: "Men must cleave to their own kind, and must be dependent upon each other. Pride and jealousy give way to the natural yearnings of the human heart for society. They begin to rub off mutual prejudices; one takes a step, and then the other; they meet half way and embrace, and the society thus newly organized and constituted is more liberal, enlarged, unprejudiced, and of course more affectionate, than a society of people of like birth and character, who bring all their early prejudices as a common stock, to be transmitted as an inheritance to posterity."

The wedding was an attractive feature of pioneer life. There was no distinction of life and very little of fortune. On these accounts the first impressions of love generally resulted in marriages. The family establishment cost but little labor—nothing more. The marriage was always celebrated at the house of the bride, and she was generally left to choose the officiating clergyman. A wedding, however, engaged the attention of the whole neighborhood. It was anticipated by both old and young with eager expectation. In the morning of the wedding day the groom and his intimate friends assembled at the house of his father, and after due preparation, departed, en masse, for the "mansion" of his bride. The journey was sometimes made on horseback, sometimes on foot, and sometimes in farm wagons and carts. It was always a merry journey; and, to insure merriment, the bottle was taken along. On reaching the house of the bride, the marriage ceremony took place, and then dinner or supper was served. After the meal the dancing commenced, and generally lasted until the following morning. The figures of the dance were three and four-handed reels, or square sets and jigs. The commencement was always a square four, which was followed by what pioneers call "jigging;" that is, two of the four would single out for a jig, and were followed by the remaining couple. The jigs were often accompanied with what was called "cutting out," that is, when either of the parties became tired of the dance, on intimation the place was supplied by some one of the company, without interruption of the dance. In this way the reel was often continued until the musician was exhausted. About nine or ten o'clock in the evening a deputation of young ladies stole off the bride and put her to bed. In doing this they had to ascend a ladder from the kitchen to the upper floor, which was composed of loose boards. Here, in this pioneer bridal chamber, the young, simple-hearted girl was put to bed by her enthusiastic friends. This done, a deputation of young men escorted the groom to the same department, and placed him snugly by the side of his bride. The dance still continues, and if seats were scarce, which was generally the case, says a local writer, every young man when not engaged in the dance was obliged to offer his lap as a seat for one of the girls; and the offer was sure to be accepted. During the night's festivities spirits were freely used, but seldom to great excess. The infair was held on the following evening, when the same order of exercises was observed.

Election days were observed as holidays. The men went to town, voted, drank whisky, smoked, swore, wrestled and fought,—all for a little fun.

The "little brown jug" was often brought into requisition as affording a means of enjoyment that nothing else could supply. No caller was permitted to leave the house without an invitation, to partake of its contents; not to so invite was a breach of hospitality not to be thought of for a moment. It was brought out upon all conceivable occasions, and freely dispensed to old and young alike, with no thought of danger. It was a thing of prime importance in all the assemblages of men,—at log-rollings, house-raisings, huskings and elections.

CHAPTER IV.

GEOLOGY OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

BY ALEXANDER WINCHELL.

The entire surface of Washtenaw county is occupied by incoherent materials commonly known as Drift. The Drift proper consists of accumulations due to the action which took place during a period of general glaciation, and the period of flooding which accompanied the dissolution of the glacier. This is overlaid, in some places, by deposits formed since the physical conditions have existed nearly as at the present day. No outcrop of any preglacial formation is known in the county, though such occur to a considerable extent in all the surrounding counties except Oakland.

I. THE DRIFT.

Unstratified and Stratified.—Beginning with the Drift, the most conspicuous and best known formation of the county, we may remark that it consists of sand, gravel and clayey loam with interspersed boulders, passing locally into deposits of fine and well-bedded clay. Careful observation reveals the fact that certain portions of the Drift appear to be quite unstratified, with boulder masses sparingly, but somewhat promiscuously, disseminated. The most common condition of the visible Drift, however, presents it imperfectly stratified. The unstratified Drift is most deeply seated. The partially stratified Drift has evidently been arranged by water. The confused stratification of the beds is such as is produced by torrential action; and there is little doubt that geological opinion is correct in ascribing the confusedly stratified Drift to the violent action of the waters resulting from the rapid melting of the continental glacier, which had accumulated those deposits still remaining as unstratified Drift or till.

Boulders.—Boulders, so abundant in the Drift, are hard, rounded masses of all sizes up to six or eight feet in diameter. One of these lies upon the University campus, which weighs about six tons. It was brought by the Literary Class of 1862 from a spot near the Michigan Central Depot. Nearly all of these boulders are of very hard rocks, and of kinds which are not found in place in any region nearer than the shores of Lake Superior and the north shore of Lake Huron. They have, therefore, been transported by some tremendous natural agency; and glaciers are generally thought to furnish an adequate explanation. Charpentier gives the dimensions of one of the largest boulders in Switzerland as 53 English feet in mean length, 48 feet in mean breadth and 60 feet in height. At least half of our boulders are strictly quartzose. In constitution they may be coarse, imperfectly coherent conglomerates, or firmly compacted conglomerates, like those on the University grounds, of which the one near the main entrance is most purely silicious, and is diversified in color by the presence of red jasper and dark flint pebbles. Other quartzose boulders are coarsely or finely granular, and in either case, they may be firmly cemented or, occasionally, somewhat friable. Others assume a vitreous condition, but preserve traces of their original granular state, so that one can easily imagine the ancient granular mass to have been softened by heat or chemical action until the separate grains, by mutual pressure, had partially coalesced. Still others have passed into a purely vitreous condition, with all traces of a former granular structure almost or quite obliterated. These quartzose boulders present a great diversity of colors, both in their general hue and in the tint of their constituents. The most purely silicious are glassy or white-opaque. Some are delicately tinted, rose-colored, or buff, or smoky. Others are of a deeper red or brown. The coloring ingredient is generally iron peroxyd, but sometimes manganese oxyd. These quartzites present so many variations in texture and color that one may make what seems a large collection of rocks, and find them all mere varieties of quartzite. About thirty per cent. of our boulders are micaceous and hornblendic rocks. Many of these are apparently quite unstratified, and constitute good examples of granites, syenites and diorites. They may generally be known by a speckled appearance,—the quartz or the feldspar in them being of a lighter color than the hornblende or mica. Sometimes they present the constituents of a granite—quartz, feldspar and mica—in a very coarse condition, and furnish admirable examples for study. More frequently, the rocks containing hornblende or mica exist in a stratified condition. Feldspar, plentifully present with quartz and mica, or hornblende, gives us a series of gneisses, which exist under all conceivable modifications of color, fineness, stratification, coherence and relative proportions of ingredients. But with feldspar absent or nearly so, we have a series of schists, which otherwise present modifications parallel with those presented by the gneisses. About ten per cent. of the boulders consist of other rocks of Northern origin. Among them, talcose and hydro-mica schists frequently occur; stratified hornblende rock less frequently; and also an occasional specimen of real protogine or Alpine granite. In addition to these, doleritic boulders are sometimes seen, and even the greenstone conglomerates of Lake Superior. Finally, about ten per cent. of our Northern boulders are limestones. These are at once recognized, generally, as derived from the "Niagara limestone," which outcrops on the Manitoulin Islands, and on the farther shore of Lake Michigan, from the neighborhood of Mackinac to Green Bay. It is a hard and marble-like rock, and for this reason has been able to withstand the wear incident to transportation from a region so remote.

Limestone Masses.—In addition to all the loose rocks thus far enumerated, we frequently find large tabular masses of loosely stratified limestone, which bear none of the common evidences of boulder transportation; and I do not include them among boulders. These masses vary from a foot to several rods in extent. They have been mistaken repeatedly for genuine outcrops of formations in place; and quarries have been opened, and limekilns built in the faith of a permanent supply of the rock. In some cases, hundreds of bushels of lime have been burned from them; and in one place which I examined near Franciscoville, in Jackson county, 20,000 bushels of lime had been manufactured. Many years ago a limekiln just east of the city limits of Ann Arbor, was long maintained from one of these masses. But invariably the formation becomes exhausted. Underneath re-appear the usual deposits of the Modified Drift. No bed rock lies within a hundred feet of most of these isolated patches of limestone. Such phenomena are of frequent occurrence through Lenawee and Hillsdale counties, and the southern part of Jackson and Washtenaw. I have seen something similar as far west as Berrien, Van Buren and Ottawa counties, and as far north as Oceana county. These outlying masses constitute a class of phenomena little known to geologists, and I believe I was the first to call attention to them in published communications.* That they do not belong to the class of boulders is manifest: 1. From the enormous size of many of them. No boulders of admitted Northern origin attain to any similar dimensions. Many of these masses far exceed even the largest boulder blocks known in more northern regions. 2. The limestone is not of such character as to endure transportation from the Northern outcrop of rocks of the same kind. It is loosely jointed, often shaly, and seamed with argillaceous matter. Glacier transportation is endurable only by the hardest known rocks. These enormous tabular pieces have been lifted gently, transported without violence, and let down in their resting places without a shock. Again, the fossils in which these masses abound proclaim more distinctly than the structure of the rock, their origin from the Corniferous formation. I have elsewhere enumerated 60 species of fossils found at Ann Arbor, while numerous others still undetermined exist. Most of these are known to occur in the tabular masses here under consideration. The fact proves beyond a doubt that these floating rocks have been derived from the Corniferous limestone. If they could not have been transported from the Northern outcrop of this formation, then from what region have they come? The nearest surface exposures of the Corniferous are in Monroe and Lenawee counties, and in

Some Indications of a Northward Transportation of Drift Materials in the Lower Peninsula of Michigan*, Am. Jour. Science, II, xi, 331-8; Supposed Agency of Ice-floes in the Champlain Epoch, Scientific Monthly, Toledo, October, 1875, and Am. Jour. Sci., March, 1876.

Northern Ohio. It seems presumable that these regions supplied the lost masses. The transportation, therefore, has been northward instead of southward, and by some other agency than glacier action. I have elsewhere speculated on the nature of this agency, and propose again to advert to the subject in another part of this paper.

Kidney-Iron Nodules.—Many curious iron concretions are found distributed through the Drift. They are generally flattened oval bodies, from an inch to six inches in length; and when broken, are found to consist of a crust containing a more solid and darker colored nucleus. Both parts contain a large percentage of finely arenaceous matter, mingled with compounds of iron. The crust shows how far the action of the weather has penetrated, and changed the constitution of the mass. The nucleus easily separates from the crust, and the separation sometimes takes place before the nodule is broken. The specimen then forms a natural and very curious "rattle-box." These nodules are undoubtedly derived from a formation well known in the southern part of the State, especially in Branch county, and designated by Dr. Houghton the "Kidney-Iron Formation." In my reports on the geology of the State, it is embraced in the "Huron Group." These "Kidneys," when sufficiently abundant, may be employed in the manufacture of iron; but of course we have no use for them in Michigan.

Masses of Gypsum.—In the central parts of Washtenaw, as well as the southwestern part of Oakland, many masses of native gypsum have been found imbedded in the earth. Mr. Joseph Brown showed me, some years ago, samples of a whitish gypsum found a mile or two west of Ann Arbor, and stated that large fragments had been obtained years before, near the Central depot. He also described another large mass "crushed between two stones," in such condition that I concluded the whole was a fragment of a formation including a gypsum bed and the contiguous strata. Evidently, such a piece has not been far transported.

Drift of Local Origin.—As the "Kidney-Iron Formation" underlies a portion of Washtenaw county and a larger area of Lenawee county, it is evident that the iron nodules have not suffered extensive transportation. Those in the northern part of the county may even have been transported a short distance from the south with the tabular limestone masses already described. Contributions from other underlying formations, including gypsum and ferruginous sandstone fragments, have been added to the Drift of remoter Northern origin, and thus given the Drift everywhere something of a local character. Geologists, impressed by the evidences of remote Northern transportation presented by the incoherent materials which overstrewn the surface of the Northern States, have overlooked the strictly local character of a considerable portion of them. I have estimated that five or 10 per cent. of the Drift has been yielded by formations not more than 10 miles removed. Not only have small masses of gypsum been sometimes found, as already stated, but the Coal Measures also disclose their contributions to the Drift by the trails of black detritus spreading southward from the out crops of the coal beds. Only the larger fragments of the coal have been transported more than a mile or two; and some of these have found their way into the northwestern part of Washtenaw. Nearer their source, however, the smaller fragments and particles become more abundant, and thus tend to discover the location of the outcrop.

Uses of Boulders.—In the absence of quarry stone, our boulders acquire a considerable importance for building purposes. They are almost universally employed for “stoning” wells and cellars, and very generally, also, broken into form, for walls beneath the coping of dwelling-houses. Boulders properly faced have also been used for substantial superstructures. In Ann Arbor, the Congregational and Baptist church edifices are built of boulders, as well as the residences of J. Austin Scott, Esq., and Hon. T. M. Cooley. The exteriors of these buildings present a solid and enduring appearance, and the general effect is pleasing. It must be confessed, however, that when split boulders are employed only for a veneering, and the center and back are irregularly filled in with brick and rubble imperfectly mixed with mortar, the solidity of the structure cannot be all which is indicated by the massive-looking external courses of masonry.

Deposits of Clay, Sand and Gravel.—The action which was exerted upon the boulder drift on the breaking up of the continental glaciers, had the effect to assort the materials which were afterward left deposited in beds, presenting a confused stratification. The varying force of the currents transported the coarser and finer products to different distances, and deposited them in different situations. Pebbles and coarse sands were dropped while yet the force of the current was considerable. Fine sand and aluminous particles were borne onward until the current was greatly slackened, and were deposited in situations comparatively protected. The beds of most existing and former lakes have afforded such protected situations, and hence it often occurs that their neighborhood yields extensive and valuable deposits of clay suitable for bricks and ordinary pottery. On the contrary, the neighboring hill-slopes may be found composed largely of the separated sand. This sand, like the pebbles and boulders, is constituted principally of silicious materials, and hence, though the grains are rounded, forms, with quick-lime and water, an excellent mortar. Pebbles, besides being assorted in beds, are quite generally disseminated through the modified drift, and especially the widely distributed and often clayey subsoil. The mixture furnishes material for a good natural road-bed; and an increased amount of gravel produces a road approximating the macadamized condition. Hence little necessity exists for paving the streets of any of our towns.

Buried Drift - Wood.—Mingled with the stony debris of the drift are numerous fragments of trees. The wood has the general appearance of white cedar; and microscopic examination reveals the peculiar discs characteristic of Coniferæ. The state of preservation is tolerably good. The wood has assumed a dun or clay color, and appears generally to have been washed. Specimens have been taken from wells at depths of 20 to 40 feet; and they are often seen in the banks of rivers. In most if not all cases their geological position is in the altered or semi-stratified drift. These fragments indicate that while certain regions were washed by torrents, other districts were sufficiently upland to support a growth of white cedar.

II. SUPER-DRIFT.

Lakes.—Above the modified drift exist the records of geological actions which have taken place since the period of the glacier-born torrents. These we will pass next in review. The lakelets with which the surface of the county is pleasantly diversified, rest in depressions shaped in the layer of modified drift. There exist within the county about 88 lakelets which attain a longer diameter of an eighth of a mile. Of these, 27 lie in the town of Lyndon, and 12 in the town of Dexter. There are none in the towns of Scio, Ypsilanti, Augusta, York and Saline. The remarkable group of lakelets in the northwestern part of the county continues through the south-eastern and eastern portions of Livingston, and thence into the central and northeastern part of Oakland. In other words, they are distributed along the scarcely descending valley of the Upper Huron and its tributaries, and are strung like beads along these streams, many of them probably the ancient work of beavers. The largest lake in the county is Portage, which is more than two miles and a half long. Though stretching a mile into Livingston county, it covers more territory in Washtenaw than any other lake, occupying in Dexter about 3,600 acres. Next in size is Whitmore lake, which is a mile and a half long and two-thirds of a mile broad, extending for half its length into Livingston. The next in extent are South lake in Lyndon, North lake in Dexter and Pleasant lake in Freedom, each of which is a mile or more in length.

The lakelets of Washtenaw county, as of the Lower Peninsula in general, are surrounded by gravelly, elevated shores on two or three sides, with frequently a low, marshy border fringing the remainder of the contour. As the streams which feed them are clear, the water of the lakes is limpid and healthful, though of the character known as "hard." They furnish, therefore, charming places of summer resort. Whitmore lake, with its elevated banks, shelving, pebbly shores, supplies of fish and contiguous hotels, has acquired considerable notoriety as a place of pleasure resort. Portage lake and others in that vicinity are much sought by fishing and camping parties. Pleasant lake, with its high banks, is a delightful sheet of water.

The same species of fish and molluscs inhabit all the different lakes of the county, however disconnected. This fact presents an interesting and difficult problem to the investigator of the origin of species. The most natural inference is that at a former period a general system of water communication existed among the various bodies of water in this part of the State, and that at this time one fauna extended through all our limits. A similar problem, but of larger magnitude, is presented by the similar faunas inhabiting different river and lake systems, and especially when the different systems discharge into the sea at different points, and their higher sources, as well as their valleys of discharge, are separated by elevations too great to admit the hypothesis of a general fresh-water inundation in former times.

Lacustrine Deposits.—It requires but casual observation to become convinced that nearly all our lakelets have formerly been of larger size. The shore upon one or more sides is frequently low and sedgy, and stretches back over an expanse of marsh and alluvial land to a sloping, gravelly bank, which we feel constrained to believe was the ancient limit of the lake. The lowland between the ancient shore and the modern is composed of a bed of peat, generally underlaid by a bed of marl. Beneath the marl may be found, in many cases, a deposit of blue, plastic clay, which forms a transition to the layer of modified drift, before described. Each of these deposits may have a thickness of a few inches or more, up to 10 or 20 feet. That all these formations have been laid down since the flooded or Champlain period is evident: 1. From their superposition on the modified drift; 2. From the fact that the lake is performing, in our own times, the same work as we see completed in the low-border marsh; 3. From our actual observation of the gradual extension of many lake-border marshes, and the corresponding diminution of the areas of the lakes.

The calcareous character of the water of these lakelets makes them a fitting abode for numerous species of lime-secreting molluscs. These animals eliminate the lime from the water, and build it into the structure of their shells. Finally the mollusc dies and its shell falls to the bottom, where it undergoes disintegration into a white powder, or becomes buried in the progressing accumulation of such material. Another portion of the marly deposit forming in the bed of the lakes is probably derived from calcareous precipitation directly from the lake water. Thus a bed of marl is forming over the whole bottom of the lake, in situations sufficiently protected and shallow to serve as the abode of shell-making animals. But on the leeward side, the immediate shore is the seat of very different operations, the result of which is the formation of a layer of peat. Bulrushes lift their heads through water one or two feet deep. A little nearer the shore flags may be seen, and still nearer, scouring rushes. On the immediate border of the land, willows and water-loving sedges hold a place, while farther back, other sedges and grasses take possession in varying proportions. This is the leeside of the lake. Floating leaves, twigs and stems therefore find their way amongst the lake-side growths, and becoming entangled, sink and go into gradual decay. More than this, each autumn's crop of dead vegetation produced around the border, contributes to the accumulating stock of vegetable material, which gradually changes into the condition of humus and peat. This is a work begun at the surface of the water. When the material sinks, it overlies whatever the lake had previously accumulated. When the peat layer is first begun, the previous accumulation is marl, and hence, the well-known order of superposition of these two deposits. The peat-bed grows lakeward as the continued formation of marl shallows the water. In the course of time the actual seat of operations becomes removed far from the ancient shore; and a broad marsh comes into existence, with peat everywhere at the surface, and marl below.

Swamps, or Ancient Lake-Sites.—I have indicated a process by which lakes are becoming filled, and their superficial dimensions shrunken. As many existing lakes have obviously been contracted from their ancient limits, so a little reflection makes it obvious that many lakes once existing have become quite extinct through the completion of the process. It is probable that every marsh marks the site of an ancient lake. Level as the surface of the water which determined their limits and depth, not a few of them retain, at some point, some vestige of the lake which they have displaced; and others exhibit all transitions from a reeking and quaking bog to an alluvial meadow: while, in nearly all cases, ditching discloses the peaty, marly and clayey materials, in the order in which, under lake action, they are accumulating before our eyes along actual lake borders. The absence of any marked general inclination of the surface in our peninsula, has made it the seat of an extraordinary number of lakelets ancient and modern, and hence, also, a region of small local marshes or filled lakelets. Some of these may be found on almost every section of land; but the majority of them are meadow lands, or even tillable fields, and constitute the choicest patches in the farmer's possession. Many of these ancient lake-sites, nevertheless, remain for the present nothing but swamps, and demand resolute ditching for their thorough reclamation. Some of these swamps, by a State system of ditching, have been properly desiccated, and others greatly improved. The following are the locations of some of the most extensive swamps found on the original occupation of the county. An extensive swamp surrounds Four-Mile lake, and stretches from the southern part of Dexter through the northwest corner of Lima, and diagonally through the center of Sylvan. This is about 11 miles long in Washtenaw county, with a width varying from half a mile to a mile and a half. Throughout six miles of its length, it fringes both banks of the North Branch of Mill creek, which joins the Huron at Dexter village. Another extensive swamp begins in the eastern part of section 11, Augusta, and stretches southeastward to section 31, where it passes into Wayne county. A third, beginning in section 33, Ann Arbor, stretches through section 4, Pittsfield, into section 10; thence, changing to a southwesterly trend and materially widening out, it passes to the southwestern part of section 17, whence bifurcating, it sends one branch through sections 20, 29, and 30, and the other branch through sections 18, 19 and 30. A fourth swampy region stretches from the south part of section 8, Saline, through sections 17 and 18, and continues along the boundary between the third and fourth tiers of sections in Bridge-water, nearly to the Raisin river. Another considerable swamp borders both sides of the South branch of Mill creek, in sections 7, 8, 17 and 18, Freedom, and sections 1, 12, and 13, Sharon. Other smaller swamps are Bear swamp in sections 16, 17, 18 and 20, Augusta; one in sections 21, 22 and 27, Superior; one in section 2, Dexter; one in sections 3, 4 and 5, Manchester; one in sections 7 and 8, Lyndon; one in section 1 and 2, Lima; one in section 17, Ypsilanti and one in section 6, Ann Arbor.

The peaty and marly deposits of our swamps possess great interest and value to the cultivator of the soil. Peat, as I have shown, is a substance of vegetable origin, and consists, therefore, of the very constituent which makes a fertile soil different from the stiff and sterile subsoil underneath. Before the cultivator of the earth took possession of the land, nature returned to the soil annually the vegetable growth which had developed at the expense of the soil. As the plant drew also much substance from the atmosphere, it returned continually more than it abstracted, and thus the soil grew deeper and richer. Thus the actual soil came into existence simply by the addition of vegetable matter to a surface having no more fertility than the ordinary subsoil which still exists. But the system of cropping takes from the soil annually the luxuriant growth which it had nourished into existence. It is a process of inevitable impoverishment. The constituents which become deficient are not simply such as mineral fertilizers can restore. The demand of the soil is for vegetable food. Now, the provision of nature is at hand with her stores of peat—nature's savings banks, the slow accumulation of ages, during which the foot of civilized man had never pressed the soil—and these supplies are adequate to indemnify the soil for the loss of crops which man converts to human uses. But crude peat is not yet sufficiently changed to become assimilable food for plants. It is sour with humic, ulmic and other acids, and needs pulverization and exposure to the atmosphere for some months. Thus prepared, it forms the most natural application possible for the recuperation of exhausted soils.

The marl, also, affords the calcareous constituent always present in strong, productive soils. Every farmer understands the superior excellence of soils overlying limestone formations. Every one has noted in passing from a soil of limestone origin to one formed by the disintegration of sandstones, how the maple disappears, the oaks grow scrubby, the wheat short and slender, and the grass thin and pale. All which distinguishes the limestone soil from the arenaceous one, is found in our exhaustless beds of marl. Soils that are lean and weak may be strengthened by supplying them with the marl and peat which bountiful nature has provided at our hands. The return of the marl to the leached hillsides is but restoring an ingredient which has been slowly filtering away as long as the surface has been under cultivation.

Bog Iron and Manganese.—I have already stated that the Drift of Washtenaw county abounds in nodules of kidney-iron ore. There are also many boulders from the Lake Superior region, which contain large percentages of hematite and magnetite; and occasionally boulders composed entirely of these ores are met with. Besides these sources of iron, the coal region lying to the northwest of us has supplied many fragments of black band, iron stone and ferruginous sandstones. Moreover, nearly all rocks, especially pyritous and micaceous rocks, contain iron as a constituent, and their slow disintegration releases it, to be acted on by atmospheric and aqueous agencies. From such sources it happens that most of the waters which percolate through the porous beds of the Drift become charged with compounds of iron in a state of solution, the most abundant of which is probably a protoxyd carbonate. The escape of these waters to the surface exposes the iron protoxyd to a process of peroxydation. The iron peroxyd is insoluble, and must therefore be precipitated. Hence the rusty sediment often observable in spring water and upon the surface of objects bathed by them. Hence the considerable accumulations of ochre in certain situations, and the impregnation of bogs by a ferruginous deposit, and finally the creation of beds of bog-iron ore. Such iron bogs occur, to some extent, on nearly every section in the county. In some cases they become very rich, and might be utilized, as they have been in some countries, in the manufacture of iron. But bog ore contains only 60 to 73 per cent. of iron peroxyd, while the limonite of Lake Superior contains 80 to 86 per cent. of iron peroxyd, the hematites from 73 to 100 per cent. of peroxyd, and the magnetites 72 per cent. of pure iron. It is manifest, therefore, that some peculiar conditions must exist to render our own bogs capable of competing with the iron deposits of Lake Superior. For supplies of mineral paint they will be more available. I have seen from Hillsdale county some excellent examples prepared from such sources; and there is no doubt that Washtenaw county is similarly supplied.

Some noteworthy localities of bog iron ore are found in Bridge-water, section 16; Augusta, sections 14 and 27 (north line), and Sharon, N. E. quarter, section 21, where red ochre is obtained. Bog manganese, or wad, is also a peroxyd originating under nearly the same circumstances as bog iron. In fact, some small proportion of manganese generally accompanies bog iron. When pure, wad is nearly black, and any considerable proportion imparts a dark tint to the mixture containing it. Bog manganese exists in considerable purity in the town of Salem; also in N. E. quarter section 21, Sharon; but other regions possess facilities so far superior for the extraction of the peroxyd that our local deposits are not likely to attain much relative importance. It has been used as a black paint for carriages.

Travertin.—The abundant calcareous masses before mentioned as disseminated through the modified drift, together with some proper limestone boulders, are subject to constant disintegration and solution by means of percolating waters. The first effect of this is to supply our soils generally with an adequate calcareous constituent, regardless of the nature of the deeply underlying strata. Another effect is to render our springs and streams abundant in lime. Limestone is soluble in pure water, but more so in water saturated with carbonic acid. This gas subterranean waters find and absorb in plentiful abundance. But these waters while under great pressure absorb more carbonic acid than can be retained when the pressure is removed by the escape of the waters to the surface in the form of springs. Some of the carbonic acid being disengaged by escaping spring waters, their solvent action on calcium carbonate is diminished, and hence, if previously saturated with this mineral, some of it must be given up. Thus, frequently, a white precipitate is thrown down which, in the bottom of standing pools and lakelets, contributes to the accumulation of marl, as before stated. But calcium carbonate when precipitated in situations more or less in contact with atmospheric air, forms a solid incrustation of limestone, called travertin. Thus, sometimes, the dried stems of mosses and other plants become incrustated, and in the former case, form what is popularly known as “petrified moss.” Sometimes the water spreads over an even surface and deposits a succession of laminae which attain collectively a thickness of several inches or feet, and present a remarkable resemblance to the structure and solidity of a sedimentary limestone. These massive travertin deposits may be quarried for lime-burning or for building purposes, like the travertin of San Vignone and other Italian localities. But within the limits of Washtenaw county, I know of none sufficiently extensive for such uses. Travertinous and tufaceous deposits on a smaller scale are, however, of very frequent occurrence; and the valley of the Huron, from Ypsilanti to Dexter, presents an almost continuous series of the more porous or tufaceous forms. Travertinous deposits in many localities are colored to some extent with intermingled precipitations of hydrated iron peroxyd. A species of conglomerate or “crag,” much resembling the “molasse” of Switzerland, frequently results from the mutual cementation of the pebbles in extensive beds, by the deposition of a calcareous precipitate in the interstices. Such beds, when stratified, are often mistaken for “bed-rocks.” Fine examples may be seen in the valley of the Huron, immediately east of Ann Arbor. Travertinous deposits often incrust the pebbles in the bottoms of shallow lakes and streams. Even the shells of mussels become similarly covered. I have especially noticed these results in Portage and Base lakes.

Wells and Springs.—Intimately connected with the Modified Drift are the existence and phenomena of springs and wells. If the porous materials were not interstratified with beds of clayey, impervious materials, all the water which falls upon the surface of the earth would percolate downward to such distance that wells would become impracticable; and the little subterranean stream would never be diverted to make its escape on the hillside. Any surface stream which might come into existence as the incident of a summer rain, would rapidly sink into the sands. In fact, there could no more be surface streams than bubbling springs and enduring wells. It is the frequent intervention of a dish of impervious clay, which arrests the waters in their downward percolation, and either holds the supply to be tapped by wells, or guides to an escape in the hillside fountain. The same cause holds the streams in their channels. The great sandy deserts of the world are illustrations of the condition which Washtenaw county would assume, if all the sandy materials of the Drift had been arranged in one superficial layer, instead of being interstratified, as they are, with sheets of impervious clay. As the whole county, with the exception of swampy tracts, is overspread with these stratified deposits, it will be understood that springs are plentiful, streams perennial, and wells generally attainable within convenient distances of the surface. These are natural advantages which cannot be too vividly appreciated.*

What has been already said will render it easily understood that any subterranean waters are always charged with solutions containing lime and iron, and other substances in smaller proportions. Our waters are generally "hard." But, in many springs, the proportion of iron also, is so large that the waters become distinctly chalybeate. This is the case, for instance, with the water supplied to the University. A series of springs issuing from the banks of a ravine in the western part of the city of Ann Arbor, were made the basis of a bathing and sanitary establishment which was maintained several years, and until destroyed by fire. The most abundant constituent of this water is calcium carbonate, but it also contains salts of magnesium, iron, sodium, potassium, and a trace of iodine.†

At Saline, salt springs attracted attention, in the early settlement of the county, and gave name to the village and the township. As the brine, however, originates beneath the Drift formation, it will be considered under the next general head.

Configuration of the General Surface.—Nearly all that has been carried by streams into the lakes or the channels of drainage from the country, has been removed from the beds of Drift materials which have thus far occupied our attention. Much of the removed material has gone in a state of solution. Some of this has been precipitated, and some organically deposited in the bottoms of lakes. Some has gone into the Huron, the Saline and Raisin rivers and Stony creek, and the West and South branches of the Rouge, and thus passed forever beyond the limits of the county. A larger proportion of the material removed from the situations in which it formerly existed, has gone in the form of mechanical sediment. The process is illustrated in every turbid stream, and in every roadside torrent which follows the summer shower. Some of this has aided in the filling of lakelets, and other portions have been borne quite out of the county. It is apparent, therefore, that surface erosions are deepening and widening all the valleys. If this process is going forward before human eyes, it must have proceeded during the past, as long as the climatic conditions have been similar to the present—that is, ever since the end of that action which distributed the modified drift. During this long period, the work of valley erosion must have contributed much to the diversification of the original surface. In other words, the principal bulk of the material removed from the valley has been removed since the epoch of the floods. The broad valley of the Huron has been lowered from 50 to 100 feet, and the other streams sunken correspondingly. Subordinate passage-ways for drainage waters have cut the original surface in other directions, and the total result has left a general superficies intersected by valleys, and relieved by numberless hills and ranges of hills. This configuration is conspicuously seen along the whole valley of the Huron and all the southwestern part of the town of Ann Arbor, the eastern part of Scio, the northwestern part of Sharon, the central part of Sylvan on each side of the great marsh, the southeastern, central and northern parts of Lyndon, and the western part of Dexter. These hillsides, especially in the town of Ann Arbor, have been extensively planted to peach-trees and vines; and the amount of peaches, grapes and other sorts of fruits shipped from the city of Ann Arbor has recently grown to important dimensions. Large portions of the county, however, are spread out in beautiful agricultural plains, and these have generally been regarded as the choicest tracts. A large part of the township of Lima possesses a gently undulating surface, and a warm, light, loamy soil. The greater part of Freedom possesses a similar character, and much of the southeastern part of Sharon is a beautiful plain. A similar tract in the town of Lodi has suggested the name of Lodi Plains. Other plain areas of less extent lie in southeastern Webster, southwestern Northfield, southeastern Salem and central Augusta.

* See the writer's Sketches of Creation, pp. 232-235.

† See analysis in the writer's State Geological Report, 1861, p. 204.

No exact observations have ever been made enabling us to arrive at any precise statement of the extent of the inequalities of the surface of the county. We know, however, that the general altitude of the surface above the level of the river at Detroit is about 325 feet.* The eastern and southern borders of the county are about 175 feet above Detroit river, while the town of Dexter rises to about 300 feet, and the western part of Lyndon to about 475 feet. An equal elevation is attained in the northeastern part of the county, near the boundary between Salem and Northfield. The highest land in the county is probably among the "short hills" of Lyndon. In all parts of the county hills exist which attain elevations 50 or 100 feet higher than the means above given. The general level about the city of Ann Arbor (University grounds) is 314 feet, while Observatory hill is 356 feet, being 128 feet above Main street, 169½ feet above the level of the Huron river opposite the old railroad tank, and 163 feet above the river at the lower bridge. The corner of Huron and Main street is 77 feet above Huron river at the lower bridge. The surface of Pleasant lake, Sept. 13, 1855, was 188.33 feet above the track at Michigan Central depot, Ann Arbor, or 382 feet above Detroit river.

As the level of Lake Michigan, which is the same as that of Lake Huron, is a convenient and generally accepted place of reference, I employ the Chicago city directrix as a datum in the tables of altitudes which follow.

This, according to elaborate determinations made by me in 1872, is three feet above "Lake Erie Base," the plane of reference of the Michigan Southern R. The Chicago city directrix is two feet below the mean level of Lake Michigan for twenty years, according to the investigations of Mr. James T. Gardner (Ann. Report Hayden Geolog. Water-Powers.—The differences of level above indicated give a sufficient fall to the principal streams of the county to afford an amount of water-power quite worthy the attention of manufacturers. The following table shows the descent of the Huron river from point to point between Dexter and Ypsilanti. In the first column are given the localities; in the second, the intervening distances; in the third, the amount of fall in the intervening distance, and in the fourth, the amount of fall per half mile.

*The altitudes refer to the surface of the water. They were noted by the engineers of the M. C. R. R., and copied and reduced by the writer in September, 1872.

It thus appears that the whole descent of the river between Dexter and Ypsilanti is 124 feet, with a mean descent of 4.1 feet a half mile, as measured along the railroad. The table also shows that the most rapid fall of the stream is between Delhi and a point 0.7 of a mile east of Delhi. Hence, other things being equal, this is the most advantageous point for the construction of a dam. The next most advantageous point, other things being equal, is at Bridge 3, 2.8 miles west of Ypsilanti, where the river falls nine feet in half a mile. The next best point is near Aspin's mills, 1.1 miles east of Delhi, where the fall is at the rate of 8.4 feet in half a mile.

If we knew the volume of water flowing in the Huron river at any stage, together with the velocity of the flow, it would be easy to calculate the total amount of water-power between Dexter and Ypsilanti, or the amount at any of the points indicated in the table. The rate of descent is one of the factors determining the velocity, and therefore one of the factors in the determination of the power. But the velocity is so much dependent, also, on the volume of water and the nature of the bottom, that no fixed ratio exists between velocity and rate of descent; and we have not the means, therefore, for calculating the velocity from the descent. But as the volume of water and the nature of the bottom are practically uniform between Dexter and Ypsilanti, we may correctly assume that the water-powers at the several points are proportional to the rates of descent, as given in the column next to the last.

So far as I am informed, no actual measurements have been recorded of the volume of water in the Huron river at any point or season. Should we assume, for the sake of an illustration, that where the river is 50 feet wide, it has an average depth of one foot, and a velocity of one mile an hour, then it will afford 11 theoretical horse-powers at locality No. 3, near Delhi, and the water would set back 0.7 of a mile. Near Kellogg's, we should have 10.8 horse-powers, and the water would set back 1.7 miles. At a point one mile east of Ann Arbor, we should have 10 horse-powers, and the water would set back one mile. At a point near Geddes, we should have 15 horse-powers, if a dam could be constructed 18 feet high, and the water would set back nearly three miles, forming an immense reservoir for storage. At Ypsilanti, we should have nine horse-powers, with a dam 10.8 high, and the water would set back 1.2 miles. At any of these points, the power would be increased by a higher dam and a longer set-back of the water. Thus, at Ann Arbor, the height of dam, 5.2 feet, which would set the water back to Bridge 8, would give $4\frac{1}{2}$ horse-powers; but the actual height of the dam, 5.6 feet, sets the water back more than a mile, and would give $4\frac{3}{8}$ horse-powers.*

Should the area of the cross-section be twice or three times 50 square feet, the power at any of the points mentioned would be twice or three times that stated above. Also, should the velocity be twice or three times as great, the power would be multiplied in the same ratio. Should the cross-section be twice as great, and the velocity twice as great, the power would be four times as great as stated. Or, to put the whole matter in a form which I trust will be intelligible to many readers, the power anywhere may be obtained by multiplying the area of the cross-section in square feet by the velocity in feet per second, and dividing by 8.8. This shows that the power is proportional to the product of width, mean depth and velocity.

Ancient Lake Terrace.—Passing across the southeastern part of the county is a well-marked ridge of gravel, readily distinguished from the ordinary less continuous accumulations of the Modified Drift, which marks, undoubtedly, an ancient shore line. It enters the county from the north, in the northwestern corner of Ypsilanti, and crossing the Huron river a couple of miles east of the village of Ypsilanti, traverses sections 5, 6 and 7 of Augusta, entering York in section 15, passing the village of Mooreville, and leaving the county at the southwest corner of section 32, York. We may add that it continues in about the same direction, as far as section 19, Lenawee county, and that its course is marked by a public highway, which runs from Ypsilanti to Le Roy. In the opposite direction, the ridge passes through section 30 of Canton, Wayne county, thence through section 33, Plymouth, and running a little east of Plymouth village, leaves the town between sections 12 and 13. It passes thence through the corner of Livonia into St. Clair county. This ridge has a breadth of several hundred feet, and is from 12 to 15 feet above the flat lands on the lake side. Where crossed by the Michigan Central railroad, it is 157 feet above Lake Michigan (Chicago datum) or 173 feet above Detroit river, or 176 feet above Lake Erie.*

* Many considerations not mentioned enter into a determination of the eligibility of a site. For instance, at a point where the fall is slight, a high dam may be erected, producing an extensive set-back, provided the banks are high and no disastrous flooding is occasioned.

This is only a sample of the system of ridges found encircling all the Great Lakes. They testify to a stage of the lake waters, in times geologically modern, remarkably different from the stage presented in human times.

Mammoth, Mastodon and Gigantic Beaver.—The remains of these animals have been found at many localities in Southern Michigan. The Mastodon has been exhumed in Lenawee and Wayne counties, the Mammoth in Jackson county, and the Gigantic Beaver in Oakland county. I am not aware of the actual discovery of such remains in Washtenaw county, but it cannot be doubted that they exist, or have existed here. Such remains always occur in beds of peat and marl, and the position indicates that these now extinct animals lived here within the modern period. The Gigantic Beaver was five feet long, exclusive of the tail, and its remains have been found from New York to Mississippi. Antlers of the deer have been exhumed in Ann Arbor, half a mile east of the University. In Lenawee county, flint arrow heads were discovered at a depth of seven feet in a peat marsh; which is five feet deeper than some of the shallowest Mastodon deposits in the town of Tecumseh.

III. FORMATIONS OLDER THAN THE DRIFT.

Our knowledge of the character and age of the rock formations underlying the Drift, can only be obtained from three sources: 1. The known general trend of formations in contiguous portions of the State. 2. The fragments found in the Drift. 3. Artesian borings.

General Trend of Formations.—The following, in descending order, are the formations underlying the surface of the Lower Peninsula.†

* In Mr. Bela Hubbard's Report of 1840, this ridge is said to have a uniform elevation of 107 to 108 feet above Lake Erie (p. 104). The profile on the map of Washtenaw county, compiled by S. W. Higgins, makes the Central railroad track where it crosses the Lake Ridge, 140 feet above the Detroit river (stage of water unknown), which is about 124.7 feet above Chicago datum, and about 143 feet above Lake Erie. I have not had time to trace out the cause of these discrepancies.

† These formations will be found described in works on the geology of the State. See the writer's Report, 1861; Walling's Atlas, 1873; Rominger's Report, 1876. Dr. Rominger writes with the Marshall (or Waverly) Group, all the Huron Group except the Black Shales constituting the lower part. The correctness of this procedure remains to be confirmed. Moreover, he applies to the Corniferous Group (so called by Dana) the name Helderberg Group, which Prof. Dana had previously employed as indicated in the above table.

Post Tertiary.	{ Super Drift.	{ Modified Drift.
	{ Drift.	{ Boulder Drift.
Carboniferous System.	{ Coal Measures.	{ Woodville Sandstone.
		{ Coal Measures proper.
	{ Lower Carboniferous.	{ Parma Sandstone (The "Conglomerate").
		{ Carboniferous Limestone.
		{ Michigan Salt Group.
Devonian System.	{	{ Marshall Group (The "Waverly").
		{ Huron Group ("Chemung" and "Portage").
		{ Hamilton Group.
		{ Corniferous Group.
Upper Silurian System.	{	{ Lower Helderberg Group.
		{ Salina Group.
		{ Niagara Group.

The Corniferous Limestone comes to the surface in many parts of Monroe county, as also in the southeastern part of Wayne. A study of the general geology of the State shows that the formation dips from these regions, under nearly the whole Peninsula, and reappears at the surface in the extreme northern part. The Hamilton Group is highly calcareous in Northern Ohio and the islands contiguous to Michigan, and in our own State it seems to be structurally confounded with the Corniferous. Many characteristic Hamilton fossils, however, occur in Southeastern Michigan as well as in place on Kelley's and other islands, and in Western Ontario. This formation also dips under the Peninsula, and re-appears in a belt arching from Thunder Bay to Little Traverse Bay. The clays of the Huron Group are well developed in Branch, Kalamazoo and Allegan counties, and, like the two previous formations, re-appear in the north. The strongly marked sandstones of the Marshall Group outcrop in Lenawee, Hillsdale, Jackson and Calhoun counties, and re-appear at Pt. aux Barques, and in Ottawa and Kent counties. The Carboniferous Limestone is found in Kent, Eaton, Calhoun, Jackson and Huron counties, above the Marshall sandstones; and all the evidences show that it underlies a great portion of the central part of the Peninsula. Above all these, the Coal Measures outcrop in Ingham, Livingston and Jackson counties.

But none of these formations outcrop in Washtenaw. As, however, the Corniferous lies on the southeast, and the Coal Measures on the northwest of Washtenaw, we know the Hamilton, Huron, Marshall, Salt Group and Carboniferous Limestone must have their places of outcrop, beneath the Drift, in due order, between the southeastern and northwestern angles of the county. As the Corniferous-Hamilton, consisting of hard limestones, must probably be traceable by visible outcrops as far northward as the formation actually extends, we may fairly conclude that Washtenaw is nowhere immediately underlaid by these limestones. The Huron shales, therefore, cover the southeastern angle of the county. From northern Lenawee and southern Jackson, the Marshall sandstone must therefore trend through the southeastern middle of the county. Also, from Spring Arbor and Leoni in Jackson county, the Carboniferous Limestone must trend, underneath the Drift, through the north-western middle of the county. The Salt Group must lie between the two last mentioned formations; that is, it must pass diagonally nearly through the center of the county. Such inferences illustrate the anomalous fact that the geology of a region must sometimes be studied through observations far removed from the region.

Fragments found in the Drift.—The indications from this source are very uncertain, in consequence of the transportation to which all Drift materials have been subject. In Southern Michigan, as I have shown, some movements from the South, in the period of Modified Drift, were the reverse of normal Drift movements. Nevertheless, rock-masses as destructible as gypsum could not have been far transported from any direction; and when we find them strewn through the center of the county, and occurring also in the southwest corner of Oakland, as they do, we may presume that the gypsum-bearing formation (the Michigan Salt Group) sweeps across the county diagonally and centrally. This conclusion is strengthened by the existence of salt springs along the border of the same belt of country, of which the most notorious are those before mentioned, in the town of Saline. This being admitted, the Carboniferous Limestone must be located in a belt a little further northwest; and the occasional occurrence of the peculiar fossils of this formation lends confirmation to the inference. Yet it must be admitted the sparseness of these fossils, in view of the close proximity of the formation, is an indication of limited breadth of outcrop.

Artesian Borings.—The deepest exploration of this kind which has been made in the county was undertaken on Main street, Ann Arbor, opposite the court-house, about ten years ago. The following is a statement of results compiled from observations made by the writer, combined with notes furnished by G. Q. Watkins, the superintendent of the work.

ARTESIAN BORING, ANN ARBOR, 1871.

At depth of	Thick-ness.	Thick-ness of Group.	DESCRIPTIONS.
0	30		Soil, gravel, etc.
30	101	DRIFT	Clay, bluish and adhesive, with alternating seams of quicksand.
65			Bottom of shaft and beginning of boring.
131	$\frac{1}{2}$		Quicksand, rendering tubing necessary.
131 $\frac{1}{2}$	$281\frac{1}{2}$		Compactly bedded shale-like materials. Tued to here.
160	4	164	Partially cemented sand. Drove two more lengths of pipe.
164	51	MICHIGAN SALT GROUP	Shale, light bluish, varying to dark-gray, not effervescing with acid, fine, laminated, with minute disseminated scales of white mica. Some portions—apparently thin seams—buffish, rather hard, very slightly effervescing with acid. Drove 4 ft. more of pipe to this shale. Water from shaft was shut off. A little water continued to appear in the pipe.
215	$\frac{1}{2}$		Crevice. Fresh water rose immediately to within 25 or 30 feet of the surface.
215 $\frac{1}{2}$	$104\frac{1}{2}$		Shale, as above the crevice.
320	6	166	A cavity from which issued inflammable gas, and a little black oil.
326	4	MARSHALL GROUP	Black shale, not effervescing with acids.
330	62		Sandstone, dun, earthy, porous, actively effervescing with acid. Contains brine. At a depth of 3 ft. in it, a sample of brine stands 50° salometer.
366	26		Same rock continuing, but more distinctly arenaceous.
392	35		Fine buffish, calciferous or magnesian sandrock,—about one-fourth dissolving in sulphuric acid.
427	13	123	Brine here 64° salometer.
430		HURON GROUP	Shale, argillaceous, bluish. The sand pump brings, with chips of shale, much sand.
433			Shale continuing. Water lowers to 40 ft. from surface. Brine here 68° salometer.
440	29		Shale continuing. Sand pump brings up no sediment.
453			Silicious shale, excessively fine, compact, bluish-gray, accompanied by gas which caused an overflow of water at the top of the well. Water afterward subsided, but some gas continued to escape.
469	251	293	Same continuing. When lighted paper is thrown down, numerous detonations occur in the well.
720		HAMILTON-CORNIFEROUS	Silico-argillaceous shale, not effervescing. Some beds of black, bituminous shale.
745			Limestone (with ferruginous specks) apparently somewhat cherty.
755			Chips of earthy magnesian limestone with some sand.
			Chips quite sandy, with magnesian limestone, iron and clay. Work discontinued.

These results may be interpreted with considerable certainty, as shown in the third column of the table. It appears that the Drift attains a remarkable thickness, and that some of the lower portion (at 131 $\frac{1}{2}$ feet) is so indurated as to be easily mistaken for the "bed-rock." As the University campus is about 86 feet higher than Main street, the depth of the Drift under the University would be 250 feet, and under the Observatory, 292 feet. It is not admissible to assume any considerable excavation in the surface of the Michigan Salt Group, and thus a local thickening of the Drift, since we find the whole normal thickness of the Salt Group present. The Michigan Salt Group presents, also, about its usual characters. This formation is the home of the gypsum found occasionally in the overlying Drift. Actual exploration, therefore, confirms the conclusion indicated on other grounds, that the salt formation passes under the center of the county. This is also the origin of brine, but in places where the formation is compact, no brine can accumulate. None was observed in this boring. The next formation below, the Marshall sandstone, is everywhere the brine-reservoir from which supplies are obtained. We have here the full normal thickness of the Marshall sandstone. Below this, at 427 feet, the drill entered abruptly the series of shales constituting the Huron Group, which I have heretofore parallelized with the Chemung and Portage Groups of Ontario and New York, inclusive of the notorious Black Shale. The thickness here developed is extraordinarily low, since at 469 feet the drill entered a series of limestones, presenting the characters of the Hamilton-Corniferous, as the formation presents itself at the surface, in Monroe county.

The brine obtained from the well was similar in constitution to that of the generality of wells in the Saginaw valley. It cannot be supposed that 68° indicates the strongest brine obtainable from the well. This degree of strength, however, implies about 17.48 per cent. of solid matter, and 34 gallons of water to one bushel of solid matter. An analysis of the solid residue was made by Mr. J. R. Jones, with the following result:

	Per cent.
Iron (in the residue after evaporation).....	2.506
Magnesium chloride.....	3.976
Calcium chloride.....	14.022
Sodium chloride (common salt).....	79.496
Total.....	100.000

The following is a comparison with brine of East Saginaw:

	E. Saginaw.	Ann Arbor.
Percentage solid matter in brine.....	22.157	17.48
Percentage of "salt" in solid matter.....	76.143	79.496
Percentage of other constituents.....	23.857	20.504
	100.000	100.000

The strength indicated by the salometer was equal to that of some brines used in the manufacture of salt; but at Ann Arbor, the cost of fuel would limit the process to solar evaporation. It is highly probable, however, that stronger brine existed at the bottom of the well. No adequate means were employed to obtain this brine, or to test the volume of the supply. In fact, little interest was felt in the result, when it became demonstrated that only salt water could be obtained.* The experiment showed that Ann Arbor is a far better locality than Grand Rapids for the manufacture of salt. Lucius Lyon manufactured salt many years ago at Grand Rapids, from brine, which marked about 22° by the salometer. James Scribner, in 1859, used brine which stood at 20°. The brine generally at Grand Rapids, ranges from 20° to 30°, but the manufacture has long since stopped. The Onondaga brines range from 63° to 68°. Not unfrequently the strength runs down (at Liverpool) to 60,° 55° and even 53°, while at Syracuse it sometimes runs up to 70°. The Kanawha brines have a strength of 40° to 50°. The Saginaw brines range from 80° to 90°; but the impurities constitute several degrees of the nominal strength.

I have, also, the following record of a shallow boring made on W. ½ N.E. ¼ section 34, York:

At depth of	Intervening thickness.	Thickness of Formation.	DESCRIPTIONS.
0		DRIFT	Soil, subsoil and sand.
10	100	110	Clay, boulders and some sand. Clay firm, sometimes dark.
110		HURON GROUP	Shale, very dark.
112			Same continuing.

Here the terrestrial surface is about 78 feet lower than Main street, Ann Arbor, while the Drift is found only 54 feet shallower. This shows that the "bed-rock" is 24 feet higher at this locality than in Ann Arbor. The dark shale struck at 110 feet may probably be regarded as the Huron shale, and hence it would follow that this locality is beyond the outer border of the Marshall sandstone. The outcrop of the Huron Group, therefore, cuts across the southeast corner of Washtenaw county.

By these various means we approximate a correct geological map of the county.

IV. GEOLOGICAL HISTORY OF THE COUNTY.

We may conclude this account with a brief sketch of the succession of geological events which have taken place within the limits known in our times as Washtenaw county. We need not go farther back than the ages when the materials of which our underlying rocks are formed were accumulating as sediments in the bottom of an ocean which had no shore upon the south, and was

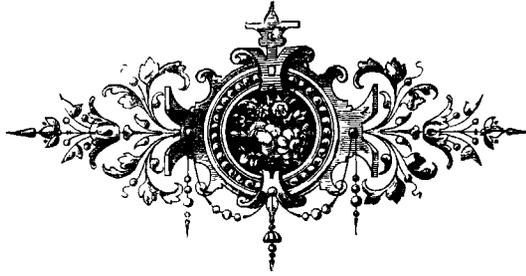

*This was predicted by the writer when consulted on the subject. A supply of fresh water for the city was a great desideratum, and a private company resolved at all hazards to sink the well for the purpose of demonstrating the character of the underlying formations. It was also foretold, on geological grounds, that no water could rise to the surface, since the hydrostatic pressure would be wanting.

bounded on the north by the highlands north of Georgian Bay and Lake Huron. This situation continued to the close of the Corniferous period, when an uplift of sea-bottom revealed land along the southern boundary of the State, which connected by a broad isthmus with a land area expanded in Southern Ohio at an epoch perhaps somewhat earlier. Washtenaw county was still sea-bottom, and only began to emerge as, in succeeding periods, the land area just named rose higher, and extended its borders northward. At the beginning of the formation of the great coal deposits, Washtenaw county was dry land. So was the entire border region of the Lower Peninsula; but all the central portion remained as a marsh over which was enacted that history which ended in the formation of the coal-beds and associated rocks. Washtenaw county was drained northward; and it may be a reminiscence of that state of things which we see in the higher altitude of the bed rock in York than in Ann Arbor. After the end of the coal-making time, the whole Peninsula was upland. Lakes Michigan, Huron, Erie and Ontario did not exist; but a stream flowed along the tracts which have become the site of these lakes. A great geological æon passed while such a condition of the surface existed. We know that it was a vast succession of ages marked by mild climates, luxuriant vegetation, and active animal populations progressively advancing in the scale of being. Not the faintest trace of all this history has been preserved in Washtenaw county, nor in any other part of the State. It was the Mesozoic æon. Still another geologic age rolled by. It was the Tertiary. We know from records elsewhere preserved, that it was marked by the enormous development of mammalian quadrupeds, and the shrinkage of the hordes of reptiles which had crawled here in the Mesozoic æon. There were forests like our own, and I imagine the whole aspect of Washtenaw county must have been much like that presented to the first civilized explorers here. After the lapse of many thousands of years, a change began to be experienced in the climate. An age of snow and ice was coming on. In the course of time, one wide glacier sheet buried the whole of Washtenaw county and the entire Northwest. Where the verdant forest had stood, and the huge mastodon had browsed from its foliage, now a scene of desolation prevailed like that which covers the surface of Greenland in our own day. Other ages passed by, and a geological spring-time appeared. The ice-sheet, which had been probably a mile in thickness, rapidly dissolved. The rocky and earthy fragments held in its embrace were let down, to become the bed of "boulder drift" which I have described. The rushing and eddying streams which sprang from the dissolving ice exerted that action which resulted, at least in part, in that overlying bed of confusedly stratified material which I have described as "Modified Drift. A little later than this we have to picture the country as flooded to an enormous extent. The barrier to the outlet of the great lake-waters had not yet been worn down at the present mouth of the Niagara river, and the water set back as one continuous lake, from the bluffs at Lewiston to Monroe—to Detroit—to Chicago. A broad channel continued from the present site of Saginaw Bay up the Shiawassee valley, into the valley of the Grand river, and thence to Lake Michigan. All the portion of our Peninsula north of that remained an island. The great "lake ridge" which runs through Washtenaw county shows that the water stood here 156 feet above the present level of Lake Michigan, or 175 feet above the present Lake Erie. Inland from this barriers existed, on the south, which partly dammed, for the time, the waters resulting from the melting of the glacier. It would seem that the southern border of our State was still somewhat higher than portions further north. The cold water accumulated in large inland lakes over Washtenaw, Lenawee, Hillsdale and Jackson counties. Severe winters congealed the surface to the depth of two or three feet or more. Around the borders of these lakes, and at other places where the water was shallow, the ice became firmly consolidated with the underlying bed-materials. Along the southern border, the Hamilton-Corniferous limestones occupying the surface were thus attached to great ice-sheets. The return of spring renewed the melting of the glacier. The inland lakes received new accessions of water. Their icy coverings were uplifted, and huge tables of stratified limestone, to which they were attached, were wrenched from their fastenings and floated. Spring-time brought south winds, and great ice-rafts with their freight of rocks were sometimes floated many miles northward. Here their loads of Corniferous limestone, as the ice dissolved, were deposited; and in such situations we find them to this day—a puzzling phenomenon which I have thus ventured to explain.

But time wore on, and the escaping waters everywhere wore deeper their channels. As the gorge of Niagara progressed, the level of the Great Lakes was lowered. The outlets of the great interior lakes becoming deepened, the lakes were gradually drained. The valleys of the Huron, Raisin and Saline rivers denote the positions of the principal drainage-ways. The mammoth and mastodon and great beaver were here; and man, probably of a Mongoloid type, pursued these beasts with weapons of flint. Innumerable lakes of smaller dimensions still remained, the consequences of the feeble slope presented by the general surface. While the peats were accumulating about their borders, many a clumsy proboscidean became mired, and left his bones to testify to us of his former presence. Or, perhaps, perishing in some ravine, a summer flood floated his carcass into a lake, since filled with peat. The modern aspect of our country was rapidly dawning. Time advanced, and the filling of many of our lakelets became complete. The civilized man at length arrived. He displaced the wild beasts and the wild men. He labored for half a century to establish himself in peace and comfort. Meantime, he pondered over the relics of the past which were everywhere around him. His thoughts were carried over a long history. Through the vista of vanished ages, events revealed themselves to his vision in ever-increasing vividness. The stream of years became illuminated. One who had glimpsed this majestic flow of events seized his pen and left recorded the vision as it was revealed to him.

CHAPTER V.

NATURAL HISTORY.

BY ADOLPHE B. COVERT.

BIRDS.

This catalogue of 257 birds includes with a few exceptions those species only which are well established and known to appear every season. All species mentioned here have been taken in the county except one (Dendroica dominica). Some species have been mentioned which may never appear again, as for instance the Summer Red-bird (Pyrranga aestiva), still it may yet become a common summer resident. The Connecticut warbler (Oporornis agilis) apparently entered the State but a few years ago, and a few years hence will be a common migrant here. It will be seen from the following list that our birds may be divided into three classes—those feeding entirely on animal matter, those whose food consists entirely of vegetable substances, and those which eat both. The latter class is the greatest, and the class feeding on animal matter is larger than the vegetarians. Although this list gives upward of 100 species not heretofore accredited to this county, it must not be regarded as complete, as I am confident that many more will yet be added to it.

There is a peculiar interest attached to the avifauna of this State which has not received the attention from ornithologists which it deserves. We have no systematic work, and but few lists of the birds of this State; but with such men as Dr. H. A. Atkins, of Locke, Ingham county; Dr. Morris Gibbs, of Kalamazoo; Hon. D. Darwin Hughes, Mr. W. H. Hughes and Charles W. Gunn, of Grand Rapids; W. H. Collens and Mr. Charles Mummery, of Detroit; Jerome Trombly, of Petersburg; and Mr. A. H. Boies, of Hudson, these difficulties which now beset our path will soon be swept away.

Family TURDIDÆ.

Turdus migratorius.—Robin. Spring, summer and fall resident; sometimes remains all winter, very abundant.

Turdus mustelinus.—Wood Thrush. Summer resident; common.

Turdus pallasi.—Hermit Thrush. Abundant spring and fall visitor; has been found breeding.

Turdus swainsoni.—Olive-backed Thrush. Very common in spring and autumn.

Turdus fuscescens.—Wilson's Thrush. A common spring visitor; sometimes nests with us.

Mimus carolinensis.—Catbird. Summer resident; very abundant.

Harporhynchus rufus.—Brown Thrush. Thrasher. A common summer resident.

The Robin and Catbird frequent the orchards and gardens, nesting about the door-yards, and prefer these places to the woods. The Brown Thrush is found in thickets of hazel brush, briars, etc., which skirt old fences and the edge of woods, and generally nest in brush heaps. The remainder of the family are confined to the woodland. Their food consists of beetles, grasshoppers, snails, spiders, caterpillars, etc., together with small fruits and berries.

Family SAXICOLIDÆ.

Sialia sialis.—Bluebird. A very abundant spring, summer and fall resident. It is found everywhere, nesting in bird-houses, fence posts, decayed trees, and feeds on winged insects, worms, grasshoppers, spiders and a scant proportion of berries.

Family SYLVIADÆ.

Regulus calendula.—Ruby-crowned Kinglet; is a spring and fall visitor, and is frequently found in winter.

Regulus satrapa.—Golden-crowned Kinglet; is abundant in spring and fall.

Poliophtila cerulea.—Blue-gray Gnatcatcher; is a summer resident. Very common.

These sub-families are, strictly speaking, woodland birds, seldom found elsewhere. The Kinglets nest to the north of us, while the Gnatcatcher frequents our woods, building its nest on the high branches of the different oaks, "a structure which cannot fail to excite our wonder and admiration. Excepting the Hummingbird's nest none can compare with this exquisite specimen of bird architecture, cunningly contrived to combine elegance with comfort, artfully rendered substantial without sacrifice of good taste, and ingeniously screened from observation by the same means that are employed for its ornamentation. True to its aspirations, the bird nestles high in trees, usually at least 20 yards from the ground, placing the fabric among slender twigs, to which it is woven, often at the extremity of a bough which sways with the wind. To insure the safety of its contents during the motion to which it is thus subjected, it is built remarkably deep, and contracted at the orifice, so that the cavity is somewhat purse-shaped, and the general shape outside is like that of a truncated cone. It seems large for the size of the bird; it is sometimes three and a half inches in height, and nearly as many in width at the base, with a diameter of two inches at the brim. The walls are closely and warmly matted or felted with the softest vegetable material, the decomposed fiber of various plants, thistle-down and the like substances, in some cases woven with spider's web. The structure is artistically finished with stucco-work of lichens all over the outside, which serves the double purpose of perfecting its beauty and making it resemble a natural excrescence. In such an elegant cradle eggs are laid, to the number of four, five, or even six, measuring scarcely three-fifths of an inch in length and less than half an inch in their greatest diameter; white in color, speckled and dashed, generally over the whole surface, with several shades of reddish or umber brown and lilac. In such a secure home as this the Blue-gray Flycatcher usually rears its brood unmolested; it has little to fear except from the Cowbird and from the ornithologist, against which enemies no art avails. The parasitic bird might have its own excuse to offer, could its motive be called in question; the other may apologize, after a fashion, by averring that even this slight sketch of the Blue-gray Gnatcatcher's life could not be finished had the nest never been rifled."—(Coues.) The food of these delicate and beautiful little fairies of our woods consists mainly of small caterpillars, mosquitoes, eggs of insects, etc.

Family PARIDÆ.

Parus atricapillus.—Titmouse or Black-capped Chickadee. Feeds upon insects, seeds, crumbs, meat, berries, etc., and generally nests in the wood, where it makes its home for the greater part of the year, but during the winter it is seen about our doors feeding on the crumbs from the table.

Family SITTIDÆ.

Sitta carolensis.—White-bellied Nuthatch; is a very common resident.

Sitta canadensis.—Red-bellied Nuthatch. A quite rare spring and fall migrant; still some springs I find this bird very common.

These birds are found in woodlands and orchards; their nests are built in holes in trees. Their food consists of ants, spiders, eggs of insects, and seeds.

Family CERTHIADÆ.

Certhia familiaris.—Brown Creeper. A common spring, fall and winter resident; sometimes remains with us during the summer, and breeds. It is a woodland bird, seldom frequenting orchard or shade trees, and feeds on insects, small beetles, seeds, etc.

Family TROGLODYTIDÆ.

Thryothorus ludovicianus.—Carolina Wren. A very rare straggler from the South.

Thryothorus bewickii.—Bewick's Wren. But one specimen of this bird has been shot in this county to my knowledge (a male, June 3, 1878).

Troglodytes ædon.—House Wren; is a common summer resident, but very local. We find this bird very common in some portions of the county and very rare in others.

Anorthura troglodytes.—Winter Wren; is a common spring and fall visitor, often remaining with us during the open winters.

Telmatodytes palustris.—Long-billed Marsh Wren. A common summer resident of our marshes, building a large globular nest of coarse sand grass. This is generally suspended to reeds or the stems of the different flags.

Cistothorus stellaris.—Short-billed Marsh Wren. A common summer resident, generally found inhabiting low meadow lands.

The birds of this family feed on spiders, grasshoppers, insects, their eggs, snails, moths, etc.

Family ALAUDIDÆ.

Eremophila alpestris.—Horned Lark. Winter resident; sometimes breeds. I have found the nest the latter part of winter when snow was still on the ground.

Eremophila alpestris, var. leucolæna.—Horned Lark. A common resident, but during our coldest weather it often withdraws to the South; breeds in April and nests on the ground.

These birds frequent barren and gravelly fields, feeding on seeds and insects. When the ground is covered with snow they may be seen feeding in barn-yards, on the droppings of the stock.

Family MOTACILLIDÆ.

Anthus lodovicianus.—Titlark. An abundant migrant in late fall and early spring, frequenting the same localities and subsisting on the same food as the preceding. Late in the fall, in the town of Pittsfield, I have often found the birds in flocks of a thousand.

Family SYLVICOLIDÆ.

Mniotilta varia.—Black and White Creeper. A very common summer resident, nesting on the ground, generally beside a fallen log.

Parula americana.—Blue Yellow-backed Warbler. Migrant, not very common, generally found in the tree-tops of our swamps and heavy timber land.

Helminthophaga pinus.—Blue-winged Yellow Warbler. Summer resident, very rare.

Helminthophaga chrysoptera.—Blue Golden-winged Warbler. A very common spring and fall migrant, frequently remaining all summer, breeding in low, damp woods.

Helminthophaga ruficapilla.—Nashville Warbler. A remarkably common migrant.

Helminthophaga celata.—Orange-crowned Warbler. A not very common migrant.

Helminthophaga peregrina.—Tennessee Warbler. A very common migrant, coming to us in late spring and early fall.

Dendræca æstiva.—Yellow Warbler. A very common summer resident. Breeds about our gardens in shrubs and low trees.

Dendræca virens.—Black-throated Green Warbler. A very common migrant.

Dendræca cærulescens.—Black-throated Blue Warbler. A very common migrant.

Dendræca cærulea.—Blue Warbler. A very common summer resident breed, nesting in the tops of tall trees.

Dendræca coronata.—Yellow-rumped Warbler. A remarkably common migrant. Probably two-thirds of our warblers found in the woods in early May are Yellow-rumps. This bird is also a rare summer resident.

Dendræca blackburniæ.—Blackburnian Warbler. A common spring and fall visitor.

Dendræca striata.—Black-poll Warbler. The last of our warblers to arrive in the spring when it comes in immense numbers. Every tree-top seems to contain two or three. Early in September this bird again returns to us on its way to its winter home.

Dendræca castanea.—Bay-breasted Warbler. A not very common migrant; still I have never failed to find it about the middle of May when on the way to its summer haunts.

Dendræca pennsylvanica.—Chestnut-sided Warbler. A common summer resident, breeds generally, building its nest in hazel brush.

Dendræca maculosa.—Black and Yellow Warbler. A common spring visitor, sometimes stays with us all summer.

Dendræca tigrina.—Cape May Warbler. Not common; comes to us in May when the apple-trees are in flower. I have found more specimens in orchards than elsewhere.

Dendræca discolor.—Prairie Warbler. I have never taken but few, and regard the bird as rare in this State.

Dendræca dominica.—Yellow-throated Warbler. I cannot learn that this bird has ever been shot in this county, still I have taken it in other portions of the State and I think it will yet be detected here.

Dendræca kirtlandii.—Kirtland's Warbler. Of this rare bird but eleven specimens have ever been taken by naturalists. Of this number I have had the pleasure to secure two,—both specimens being shot in the town of Scio on May 15, 1875, and May 16, 1879, respectively.

Dendræca palmarum.—Yellow Red-poll Warbler. Common in spring and fall.

Dendroica pinus.—Pine-creeping Warbler. Rare summer resident in this county; common in other portions of the State.

Sciurus auricapillus.—Golden-crowned Thrush or Oven Bird. Very common summer resident, frequents rather low, open woods or groves.

Sciurus naevius.—Water Thrush. Not a common summer resident; breeds.

Sciurus motacilla.—Large-billed Water Thrush. A very common summer resident, breeds abundantly in swampy timber lands.

Oporornis agilis.—Connecticut Warbler. I have secured one specimen in this county, May 17, 1880. I find no record of any ever being shot in this State before 1879, and I think the bird will yet be common here, as we have suitable localities for it. It is a very beautiful songster.

Geothlypis trichas.—Maryland Yellow-throat. A very common summer resident.

Geothlypis philadelphia.—Mourning Warbler. This handsome bird is rare in this county. I have a record of but three specimens; still it is common in other sections of the State.

Myiodictes mitratus.—Hooded Fly-catching Warbler. In my investigation I have found this bird to be a very rare summer resident, but I think it will yet be found common in some portion of the county.

Myiodictes pusillus.—Black-capped Fly catching Warbler. Very common during the spring and autumn; some remain with us all summer.

Myiodictes canadensis.—Canada Fly-catching Warbler. A very common migrant, frequently remaining all summer.

Setophaga ruticilla.—Redstart. A very common summer resident.

This interesting family, the second largest of North American birds, is mostly confined to the woodland, though a portion may be observed during spring and fall in the gardens and shade trees of towns and cities. Their principal food consists of insects, of which they devour a countless number. Birds of the genera Mniotilta and Parula are creeping warblers; those of the genus Helminthophaga are worm-eating warblers; of the genus Dendroica are wood warblers; of the genera Sciurus, Oporornis and Geothlypis are ground warblers; of the genera Myiodictes and Setophaga are fly-catching warblers,—beautiful little winged genera coming to us in May when all nature is adorned in the brightest livery. "They visit the orchard when the apple and pear, the peach, plum and cherry are in bloom, seeming to revel carelessly amid the sweet-scented and delicately-tinted blossoms, but never faltering in their good work. They peer into the crevices of the bark, scrutinize each leaf, and explore the very heart of the buds, to detect, drag forth, and destroy those tiny creatures, singly so insignificant but yet collectively a scourge, which prey upon the hope of the fruit-grower, and which, if undisturbed, would bring his care to nought.

Family TANAGRIDÆ.

Pyrranga rubra.—Scarlet Tanager. Summer visitor, very common.

Pyrranga æstiva.—Summer Red-bird. I find a record of but one specimen being shot in this State; that specimen I had the pleasure of securing. It was a fine male, taken on July 13, 1879. This bird must be regarded as a rare accidental visitor from the South.

Family HIRUNDINIDÆ.

Hirundo horreorum.—Barn Swallow. Very common summer resident.

Tachycineta bicolor.—White-bellied Swallow. Common summer resident.

Petrochelidon lunifrons.—Cliff or Eave Swallow. Common summer resident.

Cotyle riparia.—Bank or Sand Swallow. A common summer resident in suitable localities.

Progne purpurea.—Purple Martin. Formerly a common summer resident, but is being driven out by the English Sparrow (Passer domesticus).

Birds of this family feed exclusively upon winged insects, and the amount of good done by them must forever remain unknown.

Family AMPELIDÆ.

Ampelis garrulus.—Bohemian Waxwing. A very rare visitor, coming to us from the North. I have never met the bird but once, when I secured three specimens, Dec. 12, 1869.

Ampelis cedrorum.—Carolina Waxwing or Cherry Bird. A common resident, breeding in August and September.

The food of these birds consists of fruit, such as apples, cherries and berries of the mountain ash and juniper. In the spring they feed on beetles, moths, and caterpillars.

Family VIREONIDÆ.

Vireo olivaceus.—Red-eyed Vireo. An abundant summer resident, frequenting our orchards.

Vireo philadelphicus.—Brotherly-love Vireo. A very rare migrant.

Vireo gilvus.—Warbling Vireo. A common summer resident. Probably two-thirds of the small birds seen about our apple-trees throughout the summer are of this species. Too much cannot be said in their favor.

Vireo flavifrons.—Yellow-throated Vireo. A common summer resident of our woods and groves.

Vireo solitarius.—Solitary Vireo. A not common migrant generally, although some seasons it is very common.

Vireo noveboracensis.—White-eyed Vireo. I now regard this bird as a rare summer resident, although a few years ago it was quite common.

The birds of this family are found mostly in the woodlands. The Warbling Vireo is quite common in towns and cities, and the White-eyed Vireo is found along our streams, inhabiting the thickets; their food consists almost wholly of insects, of which caterpillars form a large portion.

Family LANIDÆ.

Collurio borealis.—Great Northern Shrike, or Butcher-bird. A not common winter resident. This bird also sometimes remains with us to breed. I have found it nesting here twice.

Collurio ludovicianus.—Loggerhead Shrike. A common summer resident, sometimes remaining all winter.

Collurio ludovicianus, var. excubitorides.—White-rumped Shrike. Summer resident, common.

The Shrikes or Butcher-birds form a small but interesting family of bold and spirited birds, quarrelsome among themselves. Their habits in some respects resemble those of the birds of prey; their food consists of large insects, mice and small birds. They are noted for impaling their prey on thorns or sharp twigs and leaving it sticking there, but for what purpose yet remains a mystery to ornithologists. Taken as a whole I regard the bird as beneficial.

Family FRINGILLIDÆ.

Pinicola enucleator.—Pine Grosbeak; is an occasional winter visitor. My last record of his presence was in the winter of 1874-'75.

Carpodacus purpureus.—Purple Finch. A very common migrant.

Curvirostra leucoptera.—White-winged Crossbill. A rare winter visitor.

Curvirostra americana.—Red Crossbill. A very rare winter visitor. My only records are March 18 to 27, 1869, and winter of 1874-'75, when they were common.

Ægiothus linarius.—Red-poll Linnet. A very irregular winter visitor, but very common with us.

Ægiothus linarius, var. exilipes.—American Mealy Red-poll. Rare, always found associating with the last.

Chrysomitris pinus.—Pine Linnet. A winter visitor from the North.

Chrysomitris tristis.—Goldfinch or Yellow-bird. A very common resident.

Plectrophanes nivalis.—Snow Bunting. A common, but irregular winter visitor.

Plectrophanes lapponicus.—Lapland Longspur. Winter visitor. Common.

- Passerculus savanna.*—Savanna Sparrow. A common migrant.
- Poecetes gramineus.*—Bay-winged Bunting. A very common spring, summer and fall visitor.
- Coturniculus passerinus.*—Yellow-winged Sparrow. A rare summer resident.
- Coturniculus henslowii.*—Henslow's Sparrow. A very rare summer visitor.
- Melospiza lincolni.*—Lincoln's Sparrow. A very rare migrant.
- Melospiza palustris.*—Swamp Sparrow. A common migrant, but rare summer resident.
- Melospiza melodia.*—Song Sparrow. A common spring, summer and fall resident.
- Junco hyemalis.*—Snowbird. A very common winter resident. Has been known to breed.
- Spizella monticola.*—A common winter resident.

- Spizella pusilla.*—Field Sparrow. A common summer resident.
- Spizella pallida.*—Clay-colored Sparrow. A very rare migrant.
- Zonotrichia albicollis.*—White-throated Sparrow. A very common migrant. Have found it nesting here once.
- Zonotrichia leucophrys.*—White-crowned Sparrow. A common migrant.
- Chondestes grammacus.*—Lark Finch. A rare, but very regular, migrant.
- Passer domesticus.*—English Sparrow. This detestable bird is an imported resident. A few pair first made their appearance here in 1873: the streets of Ann Arbor are now overrun with them, and they are gradually making their way to the country. Wherever they locate they drive out the martin, blue-bird, swallows, sparrows, etc. They are a seed-eating bird, and in portions of Europe do great damage to the crops of the farmer. In some of the Eastern States a bounty has already been placed on their heads, and the Legislature of Michigan would do a wise thing by making an effort to exterminate this growing evil now.
- Passerella iliaca.*—Fox Sparrow. A very common spring and fall visitor.
- Euspiza americana.*—Black-throated Bunting. A few years ago this bird was regarded as a rare summer visitor. In the spring of 1877 they made their first appearance in considerable numbers, since which time they have grown quite common.
- Goniaphea ludoviciana.*—Rose-breasted Grosbeak. Summer resident. Common. Is found breeding along our water courses, in low trees and shrubs, and nesting in orchards.
- Cyanospiza cyanea.*—Indigo Bird. An abundant summer resident, frequenting low woodlands overrun with briars.
- Pipilo erythrophthalmus.*—Towhee Bunting or Chewink. An abundant spring, summer and fall visitor; frequently remains all winter.

This is the great graminivorous family, the largest of North American birds. They are gregarious and feed entirely upon seed, except during the breeding season. Those which are residents all the year and those which are summer residents only subsist during the breeding season and feed their young almost exclusively on insects. At other times their food consists of the seeds of grass and weeds. The Rose-breasted Grosbeak is the only bird known to feed on the potato bug; and the White-crowned Sparrow feeds on the grape-vine flea-beetle. The common Yellow-bird or Goldfinch prefers the seeds of the thistle and lettuce. The Purple Finch is fond of oily seed. I had a flock of twenty-two remain with me about two weeks this fall, and feed on the seeds of the sunflower which had grown up near the back door of my home. The Fox Sparrow and Chewink scratch the ground for hibernating insects and snails. The English Sparrow feeds on the seeds contained in the droppings of animals. The Cross-bills feed on the seeds contained in pine cones.

Family ICTERIDÆ.

Dolichonyx oryzivorus.—Bobolink. An abundant summer resident.

Molothrus pecoris.—Cow-bird or Cow Blackbird; a summer visitor. Frequents old pasture land and the edge of woods. Like the European Cuckoo it builds no nest, but lays its eggs in the nest of smaller birds, such as Warblers, Vireos and Sparrows.

Agelæus phæniceus.—Red-winged Blackbird. Abundant summer visitor.

Sturnella magna.—Meadow Lark. A common summer visitor.

Sturnella magna, var. neglecta.—Western Meadow Lark. Not a rare visitor, from the West.

Icterus spurius.—Orchard Oriole. Summer resident, very common. Generally nests in the orchards; still have found it nesting in swamps and woods.

Icterus baltimore.—Baltimore Oriole. Summer resident. Abundant.

Scolicophagus ferrugineus.—Rusty Grackle. Common. Remains with us about two weeks in the spring.

Quiscalus purpureus.—Crow Blackbird. A very common summer resident.

This family is decidedly gregarious, with the exception of one or two species. Even during the breeding season, when the flocks of Sparrows are broken up and each family lives in independence, the Starlings still associate together. Their bill of fare is composed of various insects, such as caterpillars, May-flies, beetles, moths, crickets, spiders, grasshoppers, etc. Also feed on grains, such as seeds of weeds, corn, oats, wheat, etc. The Cow-bird destroys the eggs and young of other birds. The Orioles feed to a large extent during the breeding season on hairy caterpillars. I have known a single pair of these birds to destroy an entire nest of the caterpillars of the codling moth in a single day. The Orioles are the least graminivorous of the family; but in return for their watchful care over the orchard and garden, they take their tithe of the first and finest small fruits. They have also a liking for green peas, of which they generally secure their share.

Family CORVIDÆ.

Corvus corax.—Raven. Some years ago was quite common, now very rare. The last specimen secured was in 1878.

Corvus americanus.—Crow. Very abundant. Can hardly be called resident, as they withdraw to the south during the coldest part of winter.

Cyanurus cristatus.—Blue Jay. This beautiful and well known bird is a common resident.

This is the omnivorous family feeding on eggs, grubs, fruits, reptiles, young birds, mice, moles, corn, caterpillars, acorns, carrion, offal, etc. Taking the year through, I think the amount of good done by these birds more than overbalances the damage.

Family TYRANNIDÆ.

Tyrannus carolinensis.—King-Bird. Abundant summer resident. Frequents orchards and the edge of woodland.

Myiarchus crinitus.—Great Crested Fly-catcher. Abundant summer resident of our woodland. This bird has a characteristic habit of using the cast-off skin of snakes as a part of its nest.

Sayornis fuscus.—Pewee or Phœbe bird. A common summer resident, resting in open buildings and under bridges.

Contopus borealis.—Olive-sided Fly-catcher. A rare migrant. Nesting to the north of us.

Contopus virens.—Wood Pewee. Summer resident. Abundant. A bird of the orchard and woodland.

Empidonax acadicus.—Acadian Fly-catcher. Summer resident. Rare. Has been found nesting several times.

Empidonax traillii.—Traill's Fly-catcher. A not common summer resident. Has been found nesting.

Empidonax minimus.—Least Fly-catcher. A very common summer resident.

Empidonax flaviventris.—Yellow-bellied Fly-catcher. A common migrant, but rare summer resident.

The food of this family consists almost wholly of winged insects, which it captures on the wing. The King-bird and the Pewee are found in open places; the remainder of the family consists of woodland birds.

Family CAPRIMULGIDÆ.

Antrostomus vociferus.—Whippoorwill. Common summer resident.

Chordeiles virginianus.—Night-hawk. A very common summer resident.

The Whippoorwill and Night-hawk capture their prey on the wing. They are nocturnal in their habits. The Whippoorwill is a bird of the woods, while the Night-hawk affects more open places, nesting in pasture lands and frequently in corn-fields. They feed on grasshoppers, moths, flies, beetles, winged insects, etc.

Family CYPSELIDÆ.

Chaetura pelagica.—Chimney Swift, or Chimney Swallow. A very common summer resident. Nests in unused chimneys, barns, and frequently in hollow trees. It feeds on small winged insects, which it captures on the wing.

Family TROCHILIDÆ.

Trochilus colubris.—Ruby-throated Humming bird. This beautiful little gem of emeralds and rubies is a very common summer resident, coming to us in May, nesting the latter part of June, and leaving for its winter home in September. As a child, I always had a passion for the Humming-bird. It ever caused a thrill of delight when one of these glittering creatures, with its soft hum of flight, came out of repose all suddenly, hanging a sapphire stilled upon the air; for here no wings are seen, as, like a quick, bright thought, it darts, is still, and then away! "Of all animated beings" says Buffon, "the Humming-bird is the most elegant in form and brilliant in color. The stones and metals, polished by art, are not comparable to this gem of nature; she has placed it in the order of birds, but amongst the tiniest of the race she has loaded it with all the gifts of which she has only imparted a share to other birds; agility, nimbleness, grace and rich attire all belong to this little favorite. The emerald, the ruby and the topaz glitter in her garb, which is never soiled with the dirt of earth, for, leading an aerial life, it rarely touches the turf, even for an instant. Always in the air, flying from flower to flower, it shares their freshness and their splendor, imbibes their nectar, and only inhabits those climes in which they are unceasingly renewed. The Humming-bird seems to follow the sun, to advance, to retire with him, and to fly on the wings of the wind in pursuit of an eternal spring." The food of the Humming-bird consists of small beetles, spiders and winged insects, which are captured in the corolla of flowers.

Family ALCEDINIDÆ.

Ceryle alcyon.—Belted King-fisher. A common summer resident in suitable localities. The food of this bird consists of fish.

Robert Geddes
Died March 11 1866. Age 85^{yr} 3^{mo}

Family CUCULIDÆ.

Coccygus erythrophthalmus.—Black-billed Cuckoo. An abundant summer resident. A bird of the woods, but frequently seen in the orchards.

Coccygus americanus.—Yellow-billed Cuckoo. Not a common summer resident; rarely breeds. These birds feed upon hairy caterpillars, moths, young birds, eggs, berries, beetles, etc.

Family PICIDÆ.

Picus villosus.—Hairy Woodpecker. Common resident.

Picus pubescens.—Downy Woodpecker. Common resident.

Picooides arcticus.—Arctic Black-backed Woodpecker. I can record but one specimen of this arctic bird for Washtenaw county; Jan. 26, 1881, a male.

Sphyrapicus varius.—Yellow-bellied Woodpecker. Very common during migrations; some remain all summer.

Centurus carolinus.—Red-bellied Woodpecker. Very common resident. Breeds in heavy timber.

CHAPTER VI.

FLORA OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

BY ELIZABETH C. ALLMENDINGER.

In the accompanying list, when plants have been reported by other persons, the name of the finder is in each case given. The list is probably nearly complete for the country embraced within four miles of Ann Arbor. Where plants have been found in other parts of the county, the localities are given in connection with them: where no location is given it is to be understood that the plant has been found within the limits first mentioned. A great majority of the species given have been found within these limits. Undoubtedly, many are yet to be discovered in other parts of the county, but, notwithstanding this fact, the list shows the region to be one of surprising richness in variety.

Dr. Gray, in his Botany of the Northern States, gives 130 orders. In Washtenaw county 101 are represented, leaving only 29 of which we have no representatives.

Three hundred and eighty-one genera and 850 species are given in the list, which showing justifies the statement made above as to the wonderful variety found in the county.

A number of species, formerly found, are now extinct. All of these are marked with a star (*) in the list; some are worthy of note on account of rarity or being confined to small localities. These are designated by a dagger (†); and still a few others, marked (‡), should be noted as having made their appearance within 15 or 18 years.

CHAPTER VII.

THE TOLEDO WAR.

In the beginning of the year 1835 Gov. Lucas, of Ohio, sent into the Legislature of that State a message claiming jurisdiction over the territory south of the Maumee Bay, and urging legislation to possess and control it. The Legislative Council of Michigan, upon receiving notice of this from the acting Governor, passed an act on the 12th of February, 1835, "to prevent the exercise of foreign jurisdiction within the limits of the Territory of Michigan," whereby it was made highly penal for any one to accept or exercise any public office, in any part of the Territory, except by commission from the United States or from Michigan. On the 23d of February, the Ohio Legislature passed a series of acts and resolutions asserting jurisdiction over the land in question, declaring that measures should be taken by all the departments of the State Government to establish it, extending organized counties so as to cover it, and directing commissioners to run the boundary line, and requiring all public officers to extend their authority over it. Gov. Lucas at once notified the county officers to exercise their functions, and the Major-General under whose command the new districts were placed to enroll the inhabitants in the militia; and he determined to attend the spring election in person to see the complete re-organization, and appointed commissioners to meet him at Perysburg, on the first of April, to run the line. The Territorial authorities brought the matter to the attention of the President. Congress had adjourned without passing an act giving the land to Ohio, which had been sought by that State, but had failed at two recent successive sessions. Gov. Mason ordered Gen. Joseph W. Brown, commanding the Michigan militia, to hold himself in readiness to resist any attempt of Ohio to carry out the threatened measures; and the Council appropriated money to enable the executive to enforce the laws of the Territory. The Michigan authorities used such force as was necessary to repel intrusion and arrest offenders against the law, and the difficulties became very menacing. The Attorney General of the United States decided the Michigan authorities were in the right, and such was the view of the President and his advisers; but Messrs. Rush and Howard were sent out as commissioners to conciliate matters if possible. It was afterward claimed by Gov. Lucas, but denied at Washington, that these gentlemen had made an agreement that the Ohio line should be run as claimed, and the people be allowed to follow their individual predilections as to which government they would obey, until the close of the next session of Congress. It was never pretended that the Michigan authorities consented to this; and if the commissioners had possessed any authority, which the Secretary of State had expressly denied had been attempted to be bestowed on them, such arrangements as the latter, which practically would be anarchy, would have been at least very unlikely. The Michigan authorities did not accept or act on any such an arrangement, and proceeded to arrest offenders, as before, including a portion of the party of Ohio survey commissioners. Gov. Lucas called an extra session of the Ohio Legislature, and they passed a statute agreeing to the terms, as he asserted them, of the United States Commissioners, provided the United States would compel Michigan to respect them; otherwise directing that the Ohio laws should be carried out. The Governor, on the 18th of June, sent in a second message enclosing a sharp correspondence with Washington, in which the acting Secretary of State denied the correctness of the Governor's understanding of the views of the Commissioners and the President, and intimated that the latter might find it necessary to interfere with the power of the United States, if Ohio persisted in running the line with an armed escort.

The Legislature of Ohio had, at the latest session, undertaken to organize a new county named Lucas, covering the seat of difficulty; and it was understood that it was intended to open court at Toledo on the 7th of September, and that levies of troops had been made to protect the judges in so doing. Gov. Mason thereupon ordered out the Michigan forces, and took possession of Toledo, accompanying the troops in person. No opposing forces were encountered by Gov. Mason, and the Michigan levies were led back over the line, and disbanded at their various points of rendezvous. The feeling all over Michigan was intense, and it was fortunate there was no bloodshed.*

The events of this war, as it is called, partook more of the ludicrous than the serious, some of which are narrated in the reminiscence of Morell Goodrich, which are here given:

INCIDENTS OF THE TOLEDO WAR.

"The Toledo war occurred in 1835. By General Order No. 1 of that year, Stevens T. Mason, acting Governor of the Territory of Michigan, and Adj't-General Larned, the cavalry company of this place, which was in full bloom and under the command of Capt. Peter Slingerland, commissioned by Gov. Mason, myself holding the commission of First Lieutenant of said company, by the same authority, was ordered to rendezvous at the hotel kept by my father in Ann Arbor, for general inspection, and for the purpose of arming and equipping ourselves for the defense of our frontier line between our Territory and the State of Ohio, a dispute having arisen as to the original survey, whether the line that is now established was correct or not. The disputed Territory embraced a strip of land some seven miles in width, extending west to the Indiana line. We met as above stated, we inspected and passed muster, but when the time came to advance on the enemy, a difficulty arose as to the horse that I employed in doing duty in our company. It belonged to my father, and he refused to let me have it, for he wisely said he could not afford so valuable an animal to be slaughtered or captured by the foes of our glorious Territory, only on the grounds that the authorities would become responsible for the full value of the animal. Our Colonel informed the proper authorities of our situation, and very soon an order came to have the horse got in line. Accordingly it was equipped according to law, and the line was formed early in the morning. Two appraisers were appointed, viz., my father and Mosely Maynard. The business of appraisal was through with in a hurry. The horse was numbered 85. The company took dinner at father's house. We were immediately ordered to Ypsilanti to join a mounted company of that place. The number of that company was 85. When we arrived at Ypsilanti we were ordered to consolidate the two companies. The question then arose (a very important one) what to do with the extra set of officers. Col. Owen Welch, who was then young and vigorous, as many of us at that time had reason to know, proposed the following plan, viz.: that the officers of each company should throw the dice, and the highest number thrown at three trials should decide the election; and the men so elected should lead their countrymen on against the brave Buckeyes in the terrible contest now looming up in the distance between the two contending parties. The first in order was Capt. Peter Slingerland, of Ann Arbor, and Captain Forsyth, of Ypsilanti. Capt. Slingerland was elected by six dots. Then came my turn with the First Lieutenant of the Ypsilanti company. I beat him by four dots. Ypsilanti got the Second Lieutenant and Ann Arbor the Ensign. That question settled, our Colonel was transferred to the militia. Then came General Order No. 4, which was to promote our Captain to Major, to take charge of our detachment until we could join the rest of our brigade at headquarters at Monroe or Toledo. This made a vacancy in our ranks, and as a result I was promoted to the captaincy, and the balance of the officers were promoted for the same cause and in the same way, by our commanding officers. There was only one more office to be filled, and that was done by the two companies. My impression is that an Ypsilanti man was appointed, but it might have been James Welch, of Ann Arbor; I am not sure.

“Our headquarters were on the east side of the river, in a hotel kept by Dr. Andrews. How proud and haughty (not to say insolent) we were that we came out ahead of the Ypsilanti boys. They appeared rather down-hearted, but whether it was caused by their failure to secure the prominent officers, or the terrible prospect before them, I cannot say, but we cheered them up and gave them the best the house afforded in provisions and a superabundance of good whisky (not the 40-rod of the present day). It had the effect to make them, as well as us, valorous and remarkably courageous. We were gritty as hyenas and boasted greatly of our ability to whip our cursed enemies, the Buckeyes, who were unpardonable trespassers on our soil,—the very soil that our great Congressmen had bequeathed to us and our posterity. We would show them that we could whip them five to one. We would not leave a man of them to tell the awful tale to their friends, of their destruction; their braves should fall beneath our conquering heroes, and terrible should be the slaughter. Words like these fell from the lips of our noble chieftains, and were echoed back by the noble patriots who composed the rank and file of our beautiful Territory. Our country being rich in resources, the boys went their length in rations for that night at least. The next morning the Major issued his first order, Order No. 6. It was to this effect: Drilling the brigade from 6 to 8 o'clock, then from 10 to 12, then from 2 to 4. This service continued only one or two days, as we were soon ordered to the front, or to the headquarters then at Toledo.

“Our first day’s march carried us to Knaggs’ tavern, 10 miles west of Monroe, on the River Raisin. Our Quartermaster, of course, went in advance of our columns to prepare quarters for the night, for our own men, but no others. The officers had no reason to find fault with him for he made ample provision for them. He obtained permission of Maj. Knaggs that the officers should occupy the house; the horses were to occupy the barn. He got good quarters for the men in a small field near the house and barn. Here they pitched their tents for the night, after receiving strict orders from myself not to touch a thing belonging to the Major; not even the smallest thing should they appropriate that belonged to Major Knaggs. The Major was present when the order was given, and heard it. I was very explicit and told them distinctly that should they disobey the order a most terrible penalty would be certain to follow. I said, should any be caught in the act of stealing from the Major, or doing any harm to him or his property, for any such misdemeanor I should certainly report them to headquarters and have them court-martialed. The men gave three hearty cheers for the Captain, all pledging themselves to obey my order to the letter. So I left them in charge of the Ensign and lower officers until morning. The officers were provided with a bountiful supper by Major Knaggs at his own expense. Moses Rogers was Second Sergeant and my Orderly. He took the care of my horse as well as his own. We all, officers and privates, fared as well as could be expected under the circumstances.

“Next morning we were all on hand at reveille, which took place at five o’clock. The first man I met after the roll was called was Rogers. I asked how matters were. He said that the Quartermaster had furnished treble rations, the horses were getting fat, and that the cooks were preparing breakfast for all the officers and men, and that I had better eat with them, for they had been to a little extra trouble to get rations for the officers. I left him and passed on. The next man I met was Knaggs. He was in a terrible rage, as mad as a hatter. I said, 'Knaggs, what is up?' He said the boys of my company had stolen five or six swarms of his bees, all his ducks and chickens, all his decanters, tumblers, with three or four casks of liquor out of his bar, and what else, God only knew. He said he would soon find them out and have them brought to justice. I said to him it could not have been my men, for they would not disobey my orders, especially after giving the charge I did last night, and which he heard. 'It cannot be possible,' said I; but I will have the roll called after breakfast, and put them in line, and have them examined by Major Slingerland and yourself. I will also be present, and if we find any who show signs of guilt, I will have him dealt with severely by a court-martial.' This seemed to satisfy the old man for the time being. Very soon we were called to breakfast, and found that the Quartermaster had made ample preparations, as the following bill of fare will indicate: Roast beef, roast pork, ducks, chickens, turkeys, geese, butter, honey, wheat bread and coffee of the first quality were all among the eatables. I asked the boys how they got all these extra rations. The only answer given to the Major and myself was, that the commissary had furnished them. That officer being present we questioned him. He said he did furnish a part or the whole of them, and plead in justification that the Territory was rich and could afford her fighting men good rations. I related to him the charges made by Knaggs to myself. He said he would clear the company from all such charges, 'for,' said he, 'the militia have encamped near another tavern, about one mile above us, and they were caught stealing honey and chickens, and had even killed a fine ox that was owned by the tavern-keeper.' I said that did not excuse the men under my command. If any of them were found guilty, the Major and myself would certainly have them severely punished.

"At that moment Major Knaggs came in, and to my great surprise accused my men of stealing his honey, poultry, etc. He said the proof was plain enough, for they might be seen on the table. The commissary stated that he bought the beef, pork, and other eatables yesterday, and he could prove it by Hatch, the teamster, for our company. Hatch said the commissary had stated the facts, and further stated that he had been up to the other camp, and had King and a number of others up for stealing honey and other things, including ducks and beef. This rather cooled Knaggs down somewhat, but said he would not be satisfied until I had the company in line, and had them all examined. I was entirely willing, and even anxious that his desire should be complied with. I, of course, wanted to clear the boys, if not guilty, and was willing to do any thing for them I could as their chief officer. So I ordered James Welch, my orderly, to form the company into two ranks, open file of three feet space, giving the Major a good chance to examine each man. He commenced on the right of the company, and all went well until he came to one of the corporals, by the name of Wicoff. I noticed that his left arm and chest were badly swollen; the arm was a size or two larger than the other. Knaggs at that moment came up, and said we had at last got the right chap. I asked Wicoff what the matter was with his arm, and what means that swollen face, and what is the cause of this excessive rotundity of person just at this time. He said he was detailed yesterday to guard the baggage wagon, with four others detailed for the same purpose under me. 'I became tired of riding on horseback, and tied my horse to the teamster's wagon, and got on the load with him; the wheels suddenly falling into a deep rut, I was thrown from the wagon, and struck on my face and left arm, causing extreme pain and enormous swelling of my chest.' In fact, it came near killing him. I said to him: 'I for one give great credit to your statement; but I fear the Major will require you to prove it.' 'I do,' said Knaggs. I then called an orderly—Welch—to inform me whether Wicoff was detailed as he had stated. He said he was. Hatch, the teamster, being questioned, corroborated Wicoff's story. The four men who were detailed with him stated the same thing. This satisfied Knaggs. So the coast was now clear and we finished the rear rank, finding no further evidence of disorderly conduct, and the matter ended satisfactorily to Knaggs.

"About that time, Capt. Crane's detachment came past, bringing reports that the militia were stealing everything they could lay their hands on. So my company got clear from this time, and were ordered by Major Slingerland to mount and proceed forthwith to Monroe, which order was promptly obeyed. We arrived there about noon, and took our dinner in the court-house square. The dinner consisted of the remains of the rations furnished by the commissary the day before, as I have stated, except the contents of Major Knaggs' bar. The men, the night before, by order of the commissary—a respectable man from Detroit, appointed by Governor Mason—ordered a guard of eight men to draw from Knaggs' bar its contents, and start business down by the side of the River Raisin. They obeyed orders, and deposited the liquor in a still place in the river, and there it lay safely until the line of march was taken up the next morning, and then it was carefully taken up out of the river, placed in one of the baggage wagons, and conveyed to Monroe, where the company dealt it out to the men for their grog rations at their dinner. Knaggs followed on the trail; but he was not any wiser, for he never found out about the liquor. Major Slingerland took the commissary in hand about the matter, but could get no satisfaction further than that he had given Knaggs an order on the Territory for an amount that would cover the value of his liquor. So ended that chapter.

"From Monroe, we were ordered to proceed immediately to the disputed Territory on the line that divided us from Ohio. We arrived there on the evening of the day we left Monroe. On arriving there, our company formed a line in front of a tavern. The Quartermaster went into the house to secure quarters for the officers and stabling for the horses. The landlord drove him out, not with the point of the bayonet, but with an ax, and ordered us from the premises, calling us rebels and traitors to the country. He said he would have the regular army called out to defend him and his property. But it was of no use to resist the invincible host from the Wolverine State.

“Orders were given, however, as usual, to respect the man’s property, and our army was ordered to pitch their tents in the most convenient place that could be found. A strong guard was stationed to keep off the enemy and protect ourselves. The officers found quarters in the house, and the commissary furnished abundant rations for the officers, men and horses, from the landlord’s catteries, roosts and granaries, all, of course, in accordance with army regulations. The landlord and his family were put under guard, lest they should pass through our lines into the Territory of our enemies, and thus frustrate the grand objects and designs of our Government, for we were aware of the fact that should the Buckeyes be notified of our extreme weakness (only 150 strong), they might make a Bull Run advance on us and use us up. Capt. A. D. Crane with his Dexter braves and another company were far in the rear to give us immediate aid, and we had to do the best we could under the circumstances.

“We kept our enemies under heavy guard that night. A picket guard was ordered out. A scouting party was also sent out. In the morning the scouts returned with the cheering news that it was all quiet at the front. They also reported that they were very fortunate in capturing many of our enemies. But I was so unfortunate as not to see any of the captured men. What a night that was for us poor officers and soldiers. Think of the blood that was shed and the awful carnage that followed such a terrible war. The fatigue resulting from our long marches was, of course, almost intolerable. The terrible conflicts with our foes, how they loom up in history! After this fearful night, we breakfasted on the remains of beef, chickens and honey, provided by our commissary the day before.

“We were soon ordered to mount and march in close columns, lest some of our men might straggle off and be gobbled up by the enemy. We were now in the enemy’s country, and orders came from Major Slingerland to make Toledo our headquarters, that being the place where our Governor had made his headquarters. In due time we arrived there, and made our report to the Adjutant General. We soon went into camp upon the farm of Major Stickney, of the Ohio militia. He was grit to the back-bone. He threatened summary vengeance upon our men if they were so presumptuous as to put a finger upon anything belonging to him. But his threat availed nothing with our invincibles. His barns were filled with hay and grain of all kinds. Our worn-out horses gratefully acknowledged the kindness of our Quartermaster in the ample provisions made for their wants, and with appetites, almost unparalleled in the annals of war, resulting from long marches and short feed, they stowed away large quantities of the Major's fodder, not thinking, I suppose, of the awful threats of the owner.

"While the men were engaged in removing the Major's fodder from his barns to our camp, he with his rebel horde, consisting of about 20 men and boys, fell upon our men with pistols, pitchforks, clubs and other deadly weapons; but our brave boys, feeling the importance of the great work before them, were invincible, and had but little trouble in keeping the rebels at bay. When one portion of our formidable army became fatigued, another force would be employed. This kind of skirmishing was kept up for a whole week, each day, until the Major's forage was used up.

"During all this time our army was duly drilled, with scouts in the country to report the probable strength of the enemy. The reports were duly forwarded to headquarters, by orderlies who were on duty day and night, and it is not yet known how many horses were killed in the great haste to give information to the commander-in-chief. This was all important, as it was feared that unless constant dispatches were conveyed to our army, the rebels would surprise us and annihilate our entire force. Thus we defended our beautiful country. But soon an adjustment of the matter was effected and our noble army returned to their homes and their disconsolate families, without the loss of a single man or an ounce of human blood. But notwithstanding our bravery and the immense suffering from long and frequent marches, our Government has entirely forgotten us in the bestowment of pensions, either in money or lands."

In 1836 a bill was presented to the Legislature by Lewis E. Bailey for the loss of a horse in defending the Territory in this campaign. The bill was rejected, and again presented in 1837, and repeated each year until 1846, when the wise men then representing the State figured the thing up and concluded it would be cheaper to pay off the bill of $50, with interest, than to pay for printing it each year, and also the Legislators engaged in considering it. The bill was paid, and that was the last the public ever heard of the Toledo war.

STATE'S RIGHTS.

In the act of Congress providing for the admission of Michigan into the Union was contained a proviso that the people should accept a boundary line about seven miles north of the original line. While the people of the Territory were anxious that it should form a part of the Union, they were not willing to give up any of their vested rights. The boundary line had been decided many years previously, and the Territory had always exercised undisputed jurisdiction over the strip of land in dispute, and therefore did not propose to surrender it without protest.

In no part of the Territory was there more interest manifested in this matter than in Washtenaw county. Public meetings were held almost daily for some months, and the question freely discussed. The party favoring the acceptance of the terms of Congress were called "Submissionists," while the party opposed were denominated "State's Rights." The Territorial Council ordered an election held for delegates to a Convention be held at Ann Arbor to decide whether assent should be given. In Washtenaw county, two tickets were nominated. The State's Rights party placed in the field Seth Markham, Michael P. Stubbs, Marcus Lane, Ebenezer H. Conklin, G. P. Jefferies, Elnathan Noble, G. W. Glover; while the Submissionists nominated Edward Mundy, Henry Compton, A. Davis, R. Purdy, S. H. Bradley, S. Downs, F. J. B. Crane. The contest was a spirited one on both sides, and resulted in the election of the State's Rights ticket by a majority of 210, out of a total vote of 1,730.

A majority of State's Rights men were elected throughout the State, and the Convention refused to assent to the proposal of Congress, as will be seen by the following proceedings of the STATE CONVENTION.

In pursuance of an act of Congress passed June 15, 1836, and an act of the Territorial Legislature of Michigan, passed July 25, 1836, for the purpose of taking into consideration the proposition of Congress relative to the admission of the Territory as a State into the Union, a Convention was held at the court-house in Ann Arbor, the 26th day of September, 1836.

The sole question under consideration in this Convention seems to have been the demand made by the State of Ohio for a long, narrow, quadrangular strip of land on the southern border, including part of what is now called the "Great Swamp," near Toledo. By the terms of the act of Congress organizing the Northwest Territory, this strip of land belonged to Michigan, and exclusive jurisdiction was exercised over it as a part of Michigan up to 1835. At that date the building of the Miami canal and the rise of the village of Toledo made the people of that region anxious to become a part of Ohio; and Ohio, of course, was anxious to preserve the outlet of a canal which had been built mainly with her money. Ohio being the great State of the West at that time, and strongly represented in Congress, while Michigan had only a single delegate without any vote, the contest became unequal, and Michigan went to the wall. The following preamble and resolutions were passed by the Convention:

WHEREAS, The Congress of the United States, by an act entitled "An Act to establish the northern boundary of the State of Ohio, and to provide for the admission of the State of Michigan into the Union, upon the conditions therein expressed," approved June 15, 1836, did enact and declare "that the constitution and State Government, which the people of Michigan have formed for themselves, be and the same is hereby accepted, ratified and confirmed; and that the said State of Michigan shall be and is hereby declared to be one of the UNITED STATES of America, and is hereby admitted into the Union, upon an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatsoever," thereby acknowledging our Constitution as republican, and in accordance with the Constitution of the United States, and the ordinance of 1787;

And WHEREAS, Congress has also in said act inserted a proviso proposing a radical alteration of our southern and southeastern boundary, secured to us by the articles of compact contained in the aforesaid ordinance of 1787,—and which, if acceded to by the people of Michigan, would deprive us of all jurisdiction over the waters of Lake Erie, and gratuitously bestow on Ohio the exclusive jurisdiction on the waters of said lake, from the Pennsylvania line to the mouth of Detroit river; a gift, the extent of which (we believe) neither Congress nor the State of Ohio fully comprehended; and has required the people of this State to give their assent to the aforesaid change of boundaries, by a convention of delegates to be by them elected;

And WHEREAS, The Legislature of this State, without any authority derived from our constitution, by an act entitled "An Act to provide for the election of delegates to a convention," refer particularly to said act of Congress, and seem to adopt it as the basis of their action and to acknowledge the power therein assumed by Congress;

And WHEREAS, This Convention, taking into consideration the just rights of Michigan, as respects her southern and southeastern boundary, and also her constitution, embracing that part of our Territory claimed by Ohio, and believing that the assent required by the said proviso cannot be given by us without a palpable violation of our constitution (which provides the only way in which it can be amended and over which this Convention has no control), without a sacrifice of our rights and interests and without committing an act of self-degradation,—therefore

Resolved, That this Convention cannot give their assent to the proposition contained in said proviso, but the same is hereby rejected.

Resolved, Unanimously, that this Convention do most solemnly protest against the right of the Congress of the United States to attach any such condition as that contained in the Act of Congress of June 15, 1836; as being contrary to the articles of compact contained in the ordinance of 1787, and the constitution and the State government, which the people of Michigan have formed for themselves and submitted to Congress,—it being of a republican character and so conceded by its ratification and acceptance, as declared in the second section of the aforesaid act of Congress.

Resolved, Unanimously, that all questions, touching the conflicting claims of States to jurisdiction or sovereignty ought of right to be adjudicated whenever they are found to exist, by negotiation between the States interested, subject to a subsequent ratification by the Congress of the United States, or by an appeal or resort to the highest judicial tribunal of this Union.

Resolved, That a select committee of three be appointed, whose duty it shall be to prepare, in behalf of this Convention, and forward to the President of the United States, a communication to accompany the preamble and resolutions passed by this Convention.

Resolved, That three delegates be selected by this Convention, who are hereby requested to visit Washington during the approaching session of Congress to cooperate with our Senators and Representatives in Congress, for the promotion of the cause, interests and rights of the people of this State.

Resolved, That a select committee of five members be appointed to draft an address to the electors of this State, expressive of the views if this Convention.

Resolved, That this Convention have entire confidence in the validity of the constitution of the State of Michigan, and of the laws passed in conformity thereto; and recommend to the people of this State a due observance of and obedience to the same.

Resolved, That the preamble and resolutions passed by this Convention, touching the admission of this State into the Union, be signed officially by the President and Secretaries, and forwarded to the President of the United States, without delay, accompanied by the memorial to be prepared by the committee appointed for that purpose.

Done in Convention this 30th day of September, 1836.

Mr. Ellis presented a communication from Ira Smith and 30 others, inhabitants of Toledo, in the disputed territory, claiming to be citizens of Michigan, and as such, asking her protection, and solemnly protesting against the power of the Convention to surrender to Ohio the district of country lying north of the Fulton line, in which they have purchased lands of the general Government, and that, inasmuch as they have aided in forming the constitution of the State of Michigan, they deny the power of Congress to divest them of their rights and privileges under the same.

The following communications were read to the Convention:

SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE.
Detroit, Sept. 21, 1836. }

To the President of the State Convention:

SIR,—In obedience to the direction of the Executive, I have the honor to transmit to the Convention a copy of the report of the Commissioners appointed "to ascertain the correct position of a due northeast line from the most northwardly cape of the Maumee bay to the northern boundary of the U. S. I also transmit the acts passed at the First Session of the Twenty-fourth Congress of the United States, embracing the several acts relative to the establishment of the southern boundary of this State, and her admission as a member of the Union.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

KINTZING PRITCHETTE,
Secretary of State.

MONROE, Sept. 8, 1836.

The undersigned have the honor to report that they have carefully discharged the duty assigned them, viz.: to ascertain the correct position of a due northeast line from the most northwardly cape of the Maumee bay to the northern boundary of the United States; the line being one of the boundaries to which the recent act of Congress requires the assent of the State of Michigan by a change of her present constitution.

We find that a line running due northeast from the outer north cape (commonly called "the North cape") of the Maumee or Miami bay, passes River Raisin point at the distance of four miles and intersects the northern boundary of the United States at a distance of four miles and a half S. E. Point Mouillee.

We also find that the most northwardly cape (or point) within the Maumee bay, lies about three miles northwestwardly from the cape above mentioned; and that a line running due northeast therefrom passes Stony Point at the distance of about one mile S. E.; Raisin point at the distance of seven-eighths of a mile S. E., and intersects the northern boundary of the United States at the distance of one and a half miles from Point Mouillee. Of course, neither of these lines touches either Raisin point, Stony point or Point Mouillee.

A minute and detailed report accompanied by a proper map to illustrate it will be forwarded as soon as it can be prepared.

H. SMITH,
NATHAN HUBBLE.

A true copy.

ORIGINAL REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF ENGINEERS, ON THE SOUTHEASTERN BOUNDARY OF MICHIGAN:

The undersigned Committee of Engineers, appointed by your Excellency to survey and ascertain the true situation in reference to the lake coast of this State, of the line denominated by the act of Congress, on the 15th of June, 1836, as the line to be run northeast, "from the most northwardly cape of the Miami bay," to the Territorial line, being the same line proposed and submitted to the people of this State, for their acceptance or rejection, as the boundary line between Michigan and Ohio, state that they have carefully attended to the duties assigned them, and do make the following

REPORT:

Since Captain Henry Smith left us, we proceeded to the River Raisin lighthouse, and then having taken the bearing of the Turtle Island lighthouse, which we could clearly discover, we formed a base line from the first mentioned lighthouse to the River Raisin point, by which we were enabled to connect with some degree of accuracy, the position of the several points before ascertained, in relation to the anticipated eastern boundary of the State of Michigan. As we had previously in connection with Captain Henry Smith explored the Miami bay, taken the bearings of the two capes which are there discovered, and of the Turtle Island lighthouse, we were, therefore, led by means of the last observations made by us, at the River Raisin lighthouse, enabled to connect the points west of the Miami bay with the River Raisin and Stony points. The two capes above alluded to, on the northeast side of the Miami bay, are separated from each other by the distance of about three miles; and the westwardly one of which lies northwardly from the other about one and a half miles. We have, therefore, drawn two lines parallel with each other, one from each of the aforesaid capes, running a northeasterly course. From which, it appears that a northeast course from the most eastwardly and more southerly cape will pass southeast of Stony point about four miles, and southeast of River Raisin point about three miles and seven-eighths of a mile; and that a northeast course from the more eastwardly and "most northwardly cape" will pass southeast of said Stony point, at a distance of about one mile, and southeast of River Raisin point, at the distance only of about seven-eighths of a mile.

We have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servants,

HENRY DISBROW,
NATHAN HUBBLE.

I coincide in the above.

MONROE, Sept. 10, 1836.

It will thus be seen the Convention rejected the proposition of Congress for good and sufficient reasons.

SECOND CONVENTION.

Many of the people of the State were dissatisfied with the action of the Convention held in September, and a call was accordingly issued for a delegate Convention to be held at Ann Arbor, Dec. 14, 1836, to again consider the question of giving assent to the proposition of Congress. This Convention was accordingly held the date mentioned, Washtenaw county being represented by Nelson H. Wing, Salmon Champion, Jr., Nathaniel Noble, Lyman Downer, James Huston, Esek Pray, George W. Jewett, Solomon Southerland, Samuel Denton, Samuel B. Bradley, Elisha Congdon, Stoddard W. Twitchell, Jesse Warner.

Hon. Edward Mundy, of Ann Arbor, Lieutenant-Governor, and Hon. William A. Fletcher, Chief Justice, were invited to take seats within the bar of the Convention. The clergy of Ann Arbor were invited to attend and open the Convention with prayer.

John R. Williams was elected President of the Convention, and, upon taking his seat, returned thanks for the honor conferred, and then said: "The period has arrived when we can no longer postpone efficient measures to secure to our rising political star of the confederacy those advantages inseparable from, and to be obtained only by, our admission into the Union. I cannot doubt but that our proceedings will readily and permanently secure to the people of the State those positive advantages which can be secured to them in no manner so effectually as by our admission into the Union. Our country, and the district we inhabit, is eminently calculated to sustain a dense population; our climate, our soil, our navigable and commercial advantages, are unrivaled by any other State in the Union. Much depends upon our exertions and the wisdom of our councils to unfold, accelerate, and perpetuate those advantages."

Preambles and resolutions were offered by Mr. Wilkins, of Wayne; Mr. Bridges, of Cass; and Mr. Morey, of Lenawee. Each of these set forth in substance that the people of the State gave assent to the conditions imposed by Congress for the admission of the State, while at the same time protesting against Congress prescribing such conditions. The resolutions were referred to a committee, which reported, setting forth the conditions and boundary lines fixed by Congress, argued the legality of the acts of this Convention, protested against Congress making conditions preliminary to the admission of the State as unconstitutional, but believing the interest and prosperity of the State would be advanced by immediate admission into the Union, and feeling solicitous to give to sister States and the world unequivocal proof of a desire to promote tranquillity and harmony in the Union, and to perpetuate the unity, liberty and prosperity of the country; therefore, the following resolution was passed:

"Resolved, By the people of Michigan, in Convention assembled, that the assent required, in the foregoing recited act, of the Congress of the United States, is hereby given."

A letter was also prepared, addressed to the President of the United States, setting forth the state of affairs in the Territory of Michigan, the manner of the call, and the election of delegates to the Convention, showing that all the acts had been in accordance with the acts of Congress, and asking admission at once to the Union.

The Convention passed a resolution fixing the allowance to members of the Convention, and authorizing the fiscal agent to audit and pay all expenses of the Convention, including the pay and mileage of the members, and to present to the next session of the Legislature an account of the moneys disbursed by him.

After authorizing the publication of the proceedings in pamphlet form, and returning the thanks of the Convention to the President for the able manner in which he discharged his duties, the Convention adjourned sine die.

CHAPTER VIII.

COURTS AND BAR OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

The first law ever formulated was that by the Almighty when he placed Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden, and commanded that they should not eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge of good and evil under penalty of death. The law was violated, the sin of Adam's transgression entailed upon the human race, and the promulgation of other laws was rendered necessary. As a natural consequence, courts of justice became a necessity. These courts have been changed from time to time by the law-making powers, as thought would best subserve the interest of the people.

COUNTY COURT.

The first court established in Washtenaw county was that known as the county court. Its first session was held at the house of Erastus Priest, in the village of Ann Arbor, the third Monday in January, 1827, in conformity to an act of the Territorial council, establishing the time and place for holding court in this county. Hon. Samuel W. Dexter, Chief Justice, and Hon. Oliver Whitmore, Associate, appeared and constituted said court. David E. Lord was the clerk.

The following named answered to the call, and were sworn as the first grand jury in Washtenaw county: Thomas Lacrider, Willard Hall, Jonathan Kirk, John Dix, Jonathan Ely, Josiah Rosecrants, Luke H. Whitmore, Henry Himmel, Anthony Case, C. Osterhout, David Hardy, Isaac Hull, Samuel Camp, Alva Brown, Roswell Britton, Levi Hiscock, Joseph H. Peck, Andrew McInster, Rufus Pomeroy, Levi B. Pratt, Jason Cross, E. W. Rumsey.

The records of the clerk of the court state that "an appropriate charge was delivered to the jury, suitable to the occasion, by the chief justice."

O. D. Richardson was appointed by the court Prosecuting Attorney pro tem. in the absence of B. F. H. Witherell, the regular prosecutor.

The first business transacted was the application of Nathan Thomas, John Allen and Jason Cross, for license to retail "strong or spirituous liquors," which ended the proceedings of the court for that day.

On Tuesday morning, on the assembling of the court, "Joseph W. Tong, O. D. Richardson and B. F. H. Witherell came forward and took the oath as attorneys and counsellors-at-law, in conformity to the rules of the court."

Bethuel Farrant

FIRST PROBATE JUDGE OF WASHTENAW COUNTY

Died July 1852. Age 64 1/2

The venire issued to the sheriff for a petit jury was returned, and the following named persons answered to the call: Jonathan Train, Isaac Sims, Wm. Edy, Joseph Mayo, Thomas Chambers, Alexander Laverty, George W. Allen, Eldridge Gee, Isaac Powers, Samuel Higgins, J. W. Bird, James Pooling.

Mr. Witherell made a motion in favor of the admission of Elisha Belcher as an attorney and counsellor at this court, and after discussion, it was decided that he was not eligible. The next proceedings are thus recorded by the clerk:

"John Allen made application through his attorney for a license to keep tavern. The court being satisfied that said tavern was necessary for the accommodation of travelers, ordered a license to be issued, Cyrus Beckwith and Martin Davis having entered into a recognizance with him.

"By order of the court, Nathan Thomas was permitted to receive a tavern license, James Pulling and Isaac Powers having entered recognizance with him.

"Also, by order of the court, Benjamin J. Woodruff was permitted to receive a tavern license, Wm. Edy and Isaac Sims having entered into a recognizance with him.

"The following persons came forward and were sworn as witnesses to go before the grand jury: Martin Davis, Samuel Camp, David Hardy, A. H. Reading, Samuel Higgins, Elisha Belcher, Erastus Priest, Wm. Thrall, H. J. Burnham and Enos Tichenor."

A bill of indictment was found against Erastus Priest by the grand jury, for selling liquor in less quantities than one quart, without license therefor. The indictment was in the name of the United States. The court at once proceeded to try the case, the regular panel being accepted. B. F. H. Witherell appeared for the people and O. D. Richardson for the defendant. The following is the indictment:

Michigan Territory, County Court of the County of Washtenaw.

At the January term in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, the Grand Jurors of the United States of America, enquiring in and for the body of the county of Washtenaw, aforesaid, upon their oaths present that Erastus Priest, late of the county of Washtenaw, aforesaid, yeoman, on the first day of January, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and twenty-seven, at Ann Arbor, in the county and Territory aforesaid, and within the jurisdiction of the County Court of the county of Washtenaw, aforesaid, did then and there sell for money, rum and wine by less quantity than one quart; he, the said Erastus Priest, then and there not having a license or permit to keep a tavern, against the peace and dignity of the United States of America, and against the Statute of the Territory of Michigan in such cases made and provided.

B. F. H. WITHERELL,
District Attorney,

Nicholas Mallet, Alva Brown, Samuel Camp, Martin Davis, Asa H. Reading, Elisha Belcher and Enos Tichenor were witnesses on the part of the United States, and David Brown witness for defendant. The clerk in his record adds: "The case was advocated ably by the respective attorneys. The jury retired about two hours, and returned into court and said severally that the defendant was not guilty. A motion was made by the plaintiff's attorney that the prisoner be discharged; accordingly the motion prevailed and he was discharged."

This was the only case tried at this term of court. The only other business transacted was action on the application of Rev. William Page for a license to celebrate the rites of matrimony. The court, being satisfied the credentials of Mr. Page were proper, granted the license.

CIRCUIT COURT.

The Circuit Court of the county of Washtenaw—a court established by an act of the Legislative Council of the Territory, approved April 13, 1827, and presided over by one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the Territory, held its first session in the county in November, 1829. It was presided over by Hon. William Woodbridge. Its last session appears by the record to have been held in June, 1833.

By an act of the Legislative Council, approved April 15, 1833, the judges of the Supreme Court were relieved from holding the Circuit Courts, and a circuit judge appointed for that purpose. Hon. William A. Fletcher was appointed to this office, and held the Circuit Courts here from 1833 until the Territorial Courts were superseded by the judicial tribunals organized under the State Constitution. The same act, however, retained the old Circuit Court organization, but changed its name to that of the Superior Circuit Court of the Territory of Michigan, and confined its jurisdiction mainly to the decisions of questions of law. This court continued to hold its sessions in this county until the Territorial government ceased.

The first court held in the county after the organization of the State government, was the Circuit Court for the county of Washtenaw. The Circuit Courts of the several counties in the State were, by statute, required to be held by one of the judges of the Supreme Court of the State, and to the circuit embracing Washtenaw, with several other counties, Hon. Wm. A. Fletcher, who had been appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Bench, was assigned as Presiding Judge. The first term of said court commenced here November 8, 1836, and Judge Fletcher continued to hold its terms until 1842, when he resigned the office. He was succeeded as Presiding Judge of this court by Hon. Alpheus Felch, who held his first term in the county in 1842, and continued to hold the terms until his resignation in November, 1845.

Judge Felch was succeeded by Hon. Warner Wing, who was appointed in November, 1845, and held the December term of the court in that year, but was soon after assigned to another circuit, and was succeeded in the Washtenaw circuit by Hon. George Miles, who was appointed in October, 1846, and held his first term here in December, 1846. He held the office until his death. He was succeeded by Hon. David Johnson, who held the courts here, under his appointment as Judge of the Supreme Court, until the adoption of the new Constitution of 1850, and the organization of the courts as therein provided.

The judges under the State organization who have been named, were all judges of the Supreme Court of the State, but under the provisions of the Constitution of 1850, and subsequent legislative action, the judges of the Circuit Courts were elected in the several counties comprising the circuit, to act as circuit judges only, and were not members of the Supreme Court of the State.

Hon. David Johnson was the first elected to the office, and continued to hold the Circuit Courts for this county until the expiration of his term. His successor was Hon. Edwin Lawrence, who held the office from 1857 to 1869, when he was succeeded by Hon. Samuel Higby. Judge Higby held the terms until 1874, when he resigned, and Hon. Alexander D. Crane was appointed to fill the vacancy. He continued until 1876, when Hon. George M. Huntington was elected, and still continues to preside.

SUPREME COURT.

In addition to the courts already named, sessions of the Supreme Court were held here annually, until the statute requiring it was repealed and the sessions discontinued. These terms were held by Hon. George Morrell, Chief Justice, and Justices Epaphroditus Ransom, Charles W. Whipple and Alpheus Felch.

CHANCERY COURT.

An independent Court of Chancery was established in 1836, and sessions were held in this county until the court was discontinued in 1847. Hon. Elon Farnsworth was the first Chancellor, but resigned in March, 1842, and Hon. Randolph Manning was appointed in his place.

DISTRICT COURT.

A court denominated the District Court of the county of Washtenaw was organized under the act of the Legislature, and Hon. Benjamin F. H. Witherell appointed Judge. He held the first term of this court in Washtenaw county, in April, 1843, and the last in March, 1846, when the court was discontinued by act of the Legislature.

COUNTY COURTS.

By an act of the Legislature, approved May 18, 1846, County Courts were established in the several counties throughout the State, but the act was soon afterward repealed. Under this act, Hon. Charles W. Lane was elected County Judge for Washtenaw county, and held the office until his death. Hon. Edwin Lawrence was his successor, and held the terms of the court until it ceased to exist.

PROBATE COURT.

The Probate Court of the county of Washtenaw has existed from the first organization of the county. The judges of probate who have presided in this court are as follows:

Bethuel Farrand, first judge of probate, was appointed in 1827, and held the first term of court April 5 of the same year.

James Kingsley, elected in 1828 and re-elected in 1832, serving two terms.

Robert S. Wilson, elected in 1836.

George Sedgwick, elected in 1840.

Samuel P. Fuller, elected in 1844. Died before the expiration of his term.

Elias M. Skinner, appointed to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Fuller.

Churchill H. Van Cleve, elected in 1848.

Chauncey Joslyn, elected in 1852.

B. F. Grainger, elected in 1856.

Thomas Ninde, elected in 1860.

Hiram J. Beakes, elected in 1864, and re-elected in 1868.

Noah W. Cheever, elected in 1872.

William D. Harriman, elected in 1876, and re-elected in 1880.

THE BAR OF THE PAST.

The Bar of Washtenaw county has ever been a subject of pride among her citizens. Some of the best legal minds, fairest logicians and finest orators of the age have practiced before her courts, many of whom have claimed a residence in the county. In reviewing the history of the Bar it must be borne in mind that as the prosperity and well-being of every community depends upon the wise interpretation, as well as upon the judicious framing of its laws, it must follow that a record of the members of the Bar, to whom these matters are generally relegated, must form no unimportant chapter in the county's history. Upon a few principles of natural justice is erected the whole superstructure of civil law tending to relieve the wants and meet the desires of all alike. Where so many interests and counter interests are to be protected and adjusted, to the judiciary is presented many interesting and complex problems. But change is everywhere imminent. The laws of yesterday do not meet the wants and necessities of the people of to-day, for the old relations do not exist. New and satisfactory laws must be established. The discoveries in the arts and sciences, the inventions of new contrivances for labor, the enlargement of industrial pursuits, and the increase and development of commerce are without precedence, and the science of law must keep pace with them all; nay, it must even forecast events and so frame its laws as will most adequately subserve the wants and provide for the necessities of the new conditions. Hence the lawyer is a man of the day. The exigencies he must meet are those of his own time. His capital is his ability and individuality. He cannot bequeath to his successors the characteristics that distinguished him, and at his going the very evidences of his work disappear. In compiling a history of the Bar one is astonished at the small amount of material for a memoir of those who have been so intimately connected with and who exerted such influence upon the county's welfare and progress. The peculiarities and personalities, which form so pleasing and interesting a part of the lives of the members of the Bar, and which constitute the charm of local history, are altogether wanting. Unlike the fair plaintiff in Bardell vs. Pickwick, there has been no painstaking sergeant to relate "the facts and circumstances of the case." The court records furnish the facts of the existence of each individual member of the Bar, but the circumstances surrounding and giving interest to the events of his life and work are wanting.

The great prominence in history occupied by the Bar of Washtenaw county is well known and universally acknowledged. The names of Kingsley, Mundy, Fletcher, Miles, Wilcoxon, Hawkins, Skinner, Fields, Danforth, Douglass, Walker, Sedgwick and others will always reflect credit upon the Bar of this county.

Elisha Belcher came to the county in 1825, and practiced law in its courts for six or seven years, when he went further west. He was not considered a brilliant lawyer. He was the first attorney in the county.

James Kingsley came to Ann Arbor in 1826. He was a fine speaker, good advocate and an honest man. The name of "Honest Jim" was worthily bestowed. See sketch in chapter XI.

Gideon Wilcoxon came from Elbridge, New York, in 1827. He was a man of fine presence, an honest man, and considered the best attorney in the county at an early day. Before a jury he was almost irresistible.

Marcus Lane was another attorney of 1827, who settled in Ann Arbor, but afterward moved to Ypsilanti. Mr. Lane served in the Legislature and was a member of the convention of assent to the new boundary line of the State.

Geo. W. Jewett was from the State of Ohio, and settled in this county in 1829. His practice was not very extensive; and as a Justice of the Peace he attained more distinction than as an attorney. He died in 1840.

Olney Hawkins came to Ann Arbor in 1832, from Detroit, where he studied law with Judge Witherell. He was a man of fine legal abilities, and a man of influence in the community. See sketch in chapter XI.

John Allen studied law with Judge Kingsley and was admitted to the Bar in 1832. He is well known as the first settler in Ann Arbor. When the California gold fever broke out, he emigrated to that "land of promise," and there died.

Calvin Smith was also a student under Judge Kingsley, and was admitted to the Bar in 1832. After being admitted to the Bar he removed to Dexter, where he practiced his profession and served as Justice of the Peace. In 1838 he was elected a member of the Legislature, but died before taking his seat.

Elias M. Skinner was the first attorney in Ypsilanti, and settled there in 1825. He was a good attorney, an honorable man, and was Prosecuting Attorney some years. He died in Ypsilanti.

Jonathan E. Fields was from Massachusetts, and was a brother of Judge Fields, of the United States Supreme Court. He settled in Ann Arbor in 1833, where he practiced his profession a few years and then returned to his native State. He was an excellent lawyer.

Norton R. Ramsdell was a New York man who removed to Ann Arbor in 1835. In his native State he was a licensed exhorter in the Methodist Episcopal Church, but concluding he was better adapted to the law than the ministry, he pursued a course of study, was admitted to the Bar, and came West to practice. He was regarded by his colleagues, as well as the community, as a good lawyer, one who excelled as an advocate. He died in Ann Arbor.

Robert Wilson came from Allegany county, New York, in 1835. He was a man of ability, and knew how to influence a jury. He was Judge of Probate in this county one term. In 1855 he removed to Chicago and afterward served many years as one of the Police Justices of the city.

George Miles was also from Allegany county, New York, and came to Ann Arbor about the same time. He was a lawyer of more than ordinary ability, well posted in every department of law, and died here in 1850, as one of the Judges of the Supreme Court.

George Sedgwick came to Ann Arbor about the year 1835. He was a good lawyer and served as Judge of Probate in this county one term. He removed to Chicago in 186-, and died there some years after.

James M. Walker studied law with Judge Miles and was admitted to the Bar in 1847. After practicing his profession for some years in Ann Arbor, he removed to Chicago, where he occupied a leading position as an attorney. He died January, 1857.

Samuel T. Douglass was a resident of Ann Arbor and a member of the Washtenaw county Bar two years. Leaving Ann Arbor, he went to Detroit, and has since become one of the most noted lawyers in the State. After leaving, he often returned to try some important case in the courts of the county.

Justus Goodwin was a lawyer of some merit, practiced in the courts of this county at an early day. Was a member of the Legislature one term.

George Danforth came to Ann Arbor about the year 1835. His practice was not very extensive, but he was a man full of wit and managed to keep all about him in good humor. He died here about the year 1856.

Origen Richardson was admitted to the Bar at Ann Arbor. He removed to an adjoining county, but often returned and attended cases in the courts of this county. He has been Lieutenant-Governor of the State.

Among other members of the early Bar were Sylvester Abel, an excellent man, of fair abilities as a lawyer, and who was honored with many public offices. Richard G. De Puy, a young man of good legal ability, an excellent advocate, and a loyal man, who gave his life for his country in the war of the Rebellion. Daniel S. Twitchell, a graduate of the University, and a man of more than ordinary ability; Claudius B. Grant, a highly educated man of splendid ability, and who has been honored with many offices; John I. Thompson, an ex-postmaster of Ann Arbor, and a successful attorney of Milwaukee; Norman E. Welch, A. V. McAlvy, Oliver Moore, Richard Beahan, Calvin H. Chase, Caleb Clark, Edwin E. Clark, Thomas C. Cutler, Edwin W. Lawrence, Donald McIntyre, Ezra C. Seaman, John L. Tappan, C. H. Van Cleve, A. D. Stephens, M. D. Howard, George M. Danforth, Homer H. Finley, William S. Palmer, H. W. Stevenson, John N. Lucas, J. M. Martin, John C. Greening, Sibley G. Taylor, Edwin Thompson, Edward L. Maynard, T. J. McDonnell, Charles D. Coleman, Erastus Thatcher, George Cummin, John W. Young, L. D. Godfrey, E. P. Pitkin, Robert P. Sinclair, B. T. O. Clark, Charles Holmes, Jr., Charles M. Woodruff, John Carpenter, P. M. Eaton, Seth E. Engle, D. O. Church, George Skinner, Walter A. Bugbee, Charles W. Lane, George Fuller, Thomas H. Marsh, Thomas L. Humphreyville, Edward Mundy, Calvin Townsend, Levi Townsend, Isaac A. Holbrook, Julius C. Smith, Edward R. Chase, Edward Slawson, Grove Spencer, Amos W. Blodgett and Edwin F. Uhl.

THE PRESENT BAR.

All that has been said of the Bar of the past can with equal propriety be said of the present. It now numbers among its members some of the best legal minds in the State, and, as a whole, will rank with any county of its size in Michigan. The oldest member of the Bar in this county is Elijah W. Morgan, who came here in 1829, and was admitted to practice in the courts in 1832. Mr. Morgan is a well-read man, of sound judgment, and is authority in all cases affecting the titles of lands. He has always given attention to real estate business. The following are the names of the attorneys doing business in this county, together with their place of residence:

CHAPTER IX.

DARK DEEDS.

Since Cain slew his brother Abel, murder has been rife in the land. Washtenaw county, although one of the most law-abiding places in the State and nation, has yet been disgraced with several cases in which blood has been shed. Neighbor has taken the life of a neighbor, husband of a wife. The law has sometimes reached the offender, and he has suffered for his misdeeds; at other times he has been permitted to go free through some technicality; others have never been discovered.

The first case was that of the MURDER OF PATRICK DUNN.

On Monday morning, May 1, 1843, the village of Ann Arbor was thrown into quite an excitement over a report that a cool and deliberate murder had lately been committed. Patrick Dunn had just left his dwelling to commence his forenoon's work, when he was shot with a rifle in the hand of Charles Chorr, who took aim from the door of his own house. The ball entered his body just below the short-ribs, and passed through him diagonally. A quarrel had been pending for some time between the two. Dunn had previously been indicted by the grand jury for an assault and battery upon the person of Chorr, committed on June 21, 1842, which indictment was still pending. Chorr was immediately arrested and lodged in jail. Dunn survived about 29 hours and then expired. A coroner's inquest was held, the jury bringing in a verdict of willful murder. Chorr was tried at the next term of court, the trial commencing on Wednesday, Nov. 15, and ending on Saturday, November 25, when the jury brought in a verdict of "Guilty of murder in the first degree." Chorr was sentenced by Judge Witherell to be hung, and Gen. Edward Clark, who had command of the militia in that section, was asked to furnish a detachment to be present at the execution, but they were not needed, for a few days after the sentence Chorr escaped, and was never again heard from.

MURDER OF SIMON M. HOLDEN.

About 11 o'clock P. M., on Tuesday eve., Aug. 11, 1857, Simon M. Holden, of Ann Arbor, was waylaid near Chapin's furnace, and shot through the abdomen, and robbed of $500. Mr. Holden had been to Detroit, and received the money on board a ferry-boat; soon after, left on the late train for Ann Arbor, and when within a short distance of his residence, he was met by two men who demanded his money; he refused to give it up, when they seized him and succeeded in rifling his pockets. Mr. Holden made an outcry, when one of the ruffians said to the other, "Shoot him," and immediately the desperado fired, and, as has been said, the ball entered the abdomen, wounding the internal viscera. Mr. Holden lingered in great pain until 5 p. m. on Thursday evening, when death came to his relief. Robert Fuller, Esther Fuller and Frank M. Walker were indicted for the murder, by the grand jury, Sept. 11, 1857. Esther Fuller was not prosecuted, but the others were arraigned and duly tried, the jury finding them guilty. They were sentenced to the penitentiary for life. A motion for a new trial was made, and after they were taken to prison the case was taken to the Supreme Court, which body, in about one year after sentence, ordered a new trial. They were returned to Ann Arbor jail, but before court next convened they escaped from jail and were never re-captured.

MURDER OF HENRY CLAY.

On the first day of September, 1857, Jesse Prator and Henry Clay, both colored, got into a quarrel in the house of the former, when Prator shot Clay through the heart. After being shot the latter ran out of the house and fell dead in the middle of the street. Court was in session at the time. A. D. Crane, Prosecuting Attorney, was immediately summoned, and at once ordered an examination. A coroner's jury was impaneled, who found that Clay came to his death by the hands of Prator. The latter was arrested, tried, convicted, and sentenced to ten years' hard labor in the penitentiary.

A DIABOLICAL DEED.

On the night of Oct. 22, 1857, there occurred in the city of Ann Arbor one of the most brutal murders on record. The name of the murdered persons were Mrs. Henrietta Wagner and her little son Oscar, aged three years. Mrs. Wagner owned a fancy goods store at No. 4 Washington street in that city. The murderer was Henry Wagner, the husband of the murdered woman, a person about 24 or 25 years of age, rather slight in form and build and a painter by trade. When found the next morning, the woman lay with her head pounded and cut in a ghastly manner, a pool of blood surrounding her, and her night clothes bespattered with the same, while a little to one side lay the weapon—a hatchet—which had done the terrible work. Her little son Oscar was found in bed, with his head pounded in a like manner, having laid there weltering in his own blood for over eight hours. He was alive when discovered, but died shortly after. After committing the deed the man went to the jail and asked to stay all night, and was permitted to do so. On Monday afternoon, Coroner Peck held an inquest and the testimony brought out was as follows: It seems that Wagner and his wife had not been living very happily together for some time, and on the night in question Mrs. Wagner had retired, and Wagner, coming in, went to the bed and said "good night" and attempted to kiss her, but she resisted and said, "Go away; you are a crazy man and I can't live with a crazy man." He said, "Give me my money and I will go." She did not answer, and Wagner went and got the money and started to leave, when Mrs. Wagner said, "I will cut you in pieces before you go with that money." That enraged Wagner, who then took a hatchet from the wood-box and went toward her. She then called him a dog and told him to keep away. He then brandished the hatchet to frighten her, whereupon Mrs. Wagner and the child both cried "fire and murder," and she clutched him by the throat. He hit her accidentally, when she fell and said, "O my!" Wagner, seeing what he had done and thinking she could never get well, was seized with a desire to be rid of her forever, and struck her several times. He then left the house and went to the jail. He said on trial he did not remember of striking the boy at all. The jury returned a verdict that Mrs. Wagner came to her death as here stated, and bound Wagner over to the next term of Circuit Court, where he was tried before a jury of good and honest men, found guilty, and sentenced to the penitentiary for life.

MURDER OF MRS. LUCY WASHBURN.

On Monday evening, May 22, 1860, Mrs. Lucy Washburn, wife of G. W. Washburn, of Ypsilanti, was found at the foot of the cellar stairs in her dwelling, dead. Upon discovery of the body an examination was made. The dress and hair of the deceased were somewhat disarranged; one of her shoes was found in a bedroom, the other she had on her foot; there were appearances of blood about the nose and mouth, and marks as of the grasp of a hand on the throat and neck, and some other immaterial bruises. In the bedroom spoken of there were two beds. One of them was disarranged, and on the under side of the tick of the feather bed were found spots of apparently fresh blood, and there were appearances about the room that indicated that a struggle had taken place. Mr. Washburn, the husband of the dead woman, was a butcher by trade, and somewhat addicted to the use of liquor. He had not been living with his wife for some time, but had been down to see her frequently, and at the time of her death had commenced an action for divorce. When found he was in his room at the hotel, asleep, or in bed. A jury was impaneled by Justice Cook, of that city, by direction of whom a post-mortem examination was made by Drs. Ashley and Post. The jury rendered a verdict of "death by violence from some person or persons to them unknown."

Mr. Washburn was afterward arrested, tried, found guilty, and recommended to the mercy of the court by the jury.

PROBABLE MURDER.

On Wednesday morning, Nov. 6, 1861, at an early hour, John Innes was found lying dead on the sidewalk in front of Maynard, Stebbins & Wilson's store, in the city of Ann Arbor. An examination of his body showed he came to his death by a single wound just over the left temple, a gash about one and a half inches long and cut to the skull. A whisky bottle was found lying near the body. It was supposed that the gash was made by a dull hatchet, or more probably by the edge of a board or a club, and that death was caused by concussion; but on impaneling a coroner's jury, which was done at once, the following facts were brought to light: It seems that Innes had been working, during the summer, on a farm in Northfield or Salem township, and for the last few weeks had been in the city of Ann Arbor "on a spree," and that on the fatal night had left the grocery of Edward Earl, on Ann Arbor street, about 10 p. m., in company with Barnard Harkins, both being very much intoxicated; that on their way to obtain lodgings, and in front of Maynard, Stebbins & Wilson's store, Innes had fallen and struck his head on some hard substance, cutting the temporal artery, and that his death ensued from the wound, loss of blood, and exposure. He died between one o'clock that night and six o'clock next morning. The above facts were vouched for by all the jurors except one, who thought that foul play had been the cause of his death. There is no doubt but whisky was the main cause of this accident.

MURDER OF HENRY FELDMAN.

On the third day of March, 1862, Chester O. Arnold killed Henry Feldman, at Ypsilanti. A quarrel arose between them about a woman, when Arnold killed the latter with an ax. He was tried and sentenced to two years in the penitentiary.

MURDER OF JOHN C. DEPEW.

A brutal murder occurred near Chelsea in September, 1863, John C. Depew being killed by some unknown person. Henry B. Cleveland was arrested, and in December following was tried and sentenced to the State's prison for life. He served but two or three years, when he was pardoned by the Governor, there being grave doubts of his guilt. (An account of the murder will be found in the history of Chelsea.)

MURDER OF WILLIAM S. BENTLEY.

On the night of Jan. 17, 1863, William S. Bentley, of Dexter village, was killed by John Roche, of the same place. A preliminary examination was held, and the evidence showed that an altercation ensued between Bentley and Roche, growing out of cards and whisky; that they finally came to blows, and clinched, the scuffle shifting from a table to a lounge or bed, and thence to the floor; that Bentley was much the heavier man, and had the better of Roche, being on top, choking and bruising him; that Roche called to the bystanders for relief or help; that Bentley said "God — him! I'll kill him;" that a knife, which was recognized as belonging to Roche, was seen to fall on the floor between the parties; that they were separated, and Bentley threw himself on the lounge, saying that he was wounded; that the affray took place between ten and eleven o'clock at night; that a physician arrived about nine the next morning, partially dressed the wound, which was in the abdomen, and from which the intestines, in volume sufficient to fill a peck measure, in their strangulated and inflamed condition, protruded; and that Bentley died in about a quarter of an hour after the wound was dressed.

These were the main facts elicited at this examination, and Roche was therefore bound over to await the action of the grand jury.

At the next term of the Circuit Court, which convened at Ann Arbor, in March, Roche was tried, found guilty and sentenced to pay a fine of twenty-five dollars.

MURDER OF MR. SHERMAN.

On Christmas day, 1866, Mr. Sherman had John Shorey arrested on account of some difficulty. When released the latter repaired to the store of Mr. Sherman, in the fifth ward, Ann Arbor, when the difficulty was renewed. Mr. Shorey struck Mr. Sherman a blow with a stool, which caused his death a few days after. Shorey was arrested, tried and found guilty of murder in the second degree. He was sentenced to State's prison for twenty years.

MURDER OF MARTIN BREITENBACH.

On Saturday, Aug. 2, 1869, a difficulty arose between Edward H. Bycraft, George Bycraft, Walter Metcalf, George Metcalf, Henry Marsh, Elisha Marsh, Evan Marsh and Ezra Marsh with Martin Breitenbach, by which the latter lost his life from injuries inflicted by one or more of the foregoing named. Indictments were found by the jury against each, but nolle prosequi entered as to George Bycraft and George Metcalf. The remainder were tried Nov. 25, 1869, found guilty and recommended to the mercy of the court. A small fine was assessed against each of the parties found guilty but Ezra Marsh, who was sentenced to one year in the penitentiary.

MURDER OF BRYAN.

In the fall of 1869, George Knisely and Bryan got into a quarrel over some trivial matter near the opera house, Ann Arbor, but were separated by friends. They again met near the depot, when the quarrel was resumed, and Knisely struck Byran with a pocket-knife, the blade entering the heart. Strange as it may seem, Bryan walked to the square before death ensued. Knisely was arrested, and at the October term, 1869, of the Circuit Court, was tried, found guilty, and sentenced to eight years in the penitentiary.

KILLING OF GEORGE COLEMAN.

On Friday, Feb. 3, 1871, George Wood and George Coleman, both in the employ of John W. Cowan, of Sharon, got into a quarrel, when Wood struck Coleman two blows upon the head with a club or heavy cane, killing him almost instantly. Wood claimed that Coleman assaulted him with an ax, and that he acted in self-defense. An examination was held before Justice Goodyear, of Manchester, and Wood was bound over to the Circuit Court. His trial came up on Feb. 12, and on Tuesday, A. M., the jury returned a verdict of not guilty. As there was no dispute as to the homicide, the jury held the act to have been committed in self-defense. The prisoner was therefore discharged from custody.

KILLING OF HIRAM B. WARREN.

On Tuesday, Sept. 30, 1873, there occurred a most distressing accident in the township of Salem, in which Hiram B. Warren, aged 30, was shot and killed by Henry Warren, a half-witted boy, aged 18, and a cousin of the murdered man. The facts gained at the trial were, that the men, with a hired boy, were in the corn-field at work, when Henry came up behind Hiram within six feet, and when intending to shoot over Hiram's head to scare him, the gun (being loaded only with a large charge of powder and wad) slipped, the muzzle falling part way down, and going off, blowing Hiram's brains out. This was the second attempt of the same kind to "scare" Hiram that he had made the same forenoon. Henry was tried at the next term of the Circuit Court, found guilty, and sentenced to the House of Correction for one and a half years.

MURDER OF RICHARD FLANNARY.

Richard Flannary, proprietor of a saloon on the southwest corner of Main and Catharine streets, Ann Arbor, was so badly injured in a row in his own saloon, on Friday evening, Oct. 30, 1874, that he died the following Sunday night.

The facts obtained at the coroner's inquest summed up are as follows: On the night of Oct. 30 several men were in the saloon, among them, Joseph Audett, Hiram Pickard, Peter Hanlon, John Norton and two strangers. Pickard was moving around, very drunk at the time, and for no cause, struck one of the strangers in the face. Flannary and a man named Holliday told Pickard it "was too bad to strike a man that way," so Pickard walked up and shook hands with the stranger, begged his pardon and moved off. Soon after Pickard told Hanlon to pay Flannary the ten cents he owed him, when Hanlon said he did not owe anything. Pickard then knocked Hanlon down, and was told by Flannary to leave the house. Pickard said he would go when he got ready, and then Flannary put his hand on Pickard's collar, and said, "You must go now." Pickard offered resistance, and John Flannary came to his brother's assistance. The two got Pickard between the screen and the door, when a man named Jethro Maybe jumped up and started toward them. The man Holliday told Maybe to "leave them alone." Maybe then grasped John Flannary and pulled him away, leaving Pickard in the hands of Richard Flannary. Holliday took hold of Maybe and pulled him away from John Flannary. Maybe picked up a chair and Holliday said, "Don't strike me with that." Then Maybe passed behind the stove, and when near to Richard Flannary, raised the chair and struck Flannary a tremendous blow on top of the head, crushing in the skull. Flannary fell to the floor senseless. Flannary was then taken to his home and Dr. Smith called in, who was in attendance till his death, which occurred the Sunday evening following. Flannary lay in a comatose condition from the time of the blow till his death. Dr. Smith, assisted by Dr. Leiter, held a post-mortem examination on the body, and Dr. Smith said, "In my opinion the fracture of the skull and resulting hemorrhage and pressure upon the brain by the clot caused death," Dr. Leiter agreeing with him in this opinion.

The coroner's jury gave the following verdict: "That the deceased, Richard Flannary, came to his death by a blow from a chair in the hands of Jethro Maybe, on the night of Friday, the 30th of October, 1874; and further, that Hiram Pickard was present and assisted, aided, and abetted in the assault."

Flannary had not been in the saloon business very long, and was said to have been a quiet and inoffensive man. He left a wife and three small children to mourn his sudden death.

Complaint was filed Nov. 23, 1874, and indictment found. The case was placed on trial March 9, and continued three days. The jury failed to agree, and the prisoners were remanded to jail. On the 22d of Sept., 1875, the case was again called, and the trial proceeded with, lasting two days. A verdict of guilty of manslaughter was rendered, and Maybe sentenced to the State's prison for one year.

MURDER OF LUDWIG MILLER.

On Tuesday night, Aug. 10, 1875, Ludwig Miller was murdered in cold blood by Lyman Burkhardt, a 15-year-old lad who was working for him on his farm in the township of Scio. The young man confessed to the foul deed, claiming he did it for revenge, on account of a whipping administered to him by Miller. From the evidence it appears Miller was asleep by the side of his wife when young Burkhardt entered their room, placed the gun over Mrs. Miller's head, pulling the trigger, sending the soul of Miller into eternity. On his trial before Judge Crane, in September following, the youth acknowledged the truth of his first statement before the coroner, and evinced no sorrow for the crime. He was sentenced to State's prison for life.

MURDER OF MR. RUMSEY.

George Henning, in the fall of 1876, was in the employ of Mr. Rumsey, of Dexter, and in a dispute on the settlement of his claim for labor, kicked Rumsey in the groin, causing death in a few days. Henning, at the March term, 1877, plead guilty to manslaughter, and was sentenced to four years in the State's prison.

SHOOTING OF WILLIAM BATEY.

On Friday morning, March 30, 1877, George Cook, of Saline, shot William B. Batey, of the same place, injuring him so that he died the following day. The cause of the fatal act was that Batey had caused some trouble in the neighborhood a few weeks before, for which he was confined in jail but was released, and on Thursday he took Miss Sarah Cook, a girl aged 17, and went to Stony Creek, intending to marry her; but not finding a preacher, they returned to Saline, and she spent the night at Mr. Batey's, father of William B. In the morning she went over to her mother's, who was a very respectable widow lady, after her clothing, saying she was going to be married to Batey that day, Friday, at 10 o'clock. Her mother protested, but her entreaties were unavailing, and Sarah started to go, when her brother, George Cook, who had by this time become thoroughly exasperated, said she should never marry Batey; and taking his rifle, started out just ahead of his sister, who, as she left, said, "Good-bye, mother; I am not coming back to live with you any more." She started for Batey's one way, and her brother another, the house being distant about half a mile. Batey was seen coming from Edward Ardell's when Cook's sister told him to "run, for her brother was going to shoot him;" whereupon he started to run, when Cook, who was about twenty rods away, fired and shot him in the abdomen, about two inches below the navel, the ball passing through the intestines and lodging in the spinal column. Batey immediately cried out "I am shot," and went into his father's house. He lingered until Saturday morning, when he expired. Cook, after shooting Batey, went up to the justice's office and gave himself up, waived examination, and was let out on bail, but after Batey's death was taken to Ann Arbor and lodged in jail to await trial. The case came up at the next term of court, and Cook was found guilty of manslaughter, on Nov. 9 of same year, but the case was carried to the Supreme Court of the State, who after mature deliberation reaffirmed the decision of the lower court, and Cook was therefore sentenced by the presiding judge to seven years' hard labor in the State's prison.

Lorren Mills

HORRIBLE MURDER.

On Sunday, at about 11 A. M., Jan. 20, 1878, the little village of Dexter was thrown into terrible excitement, through a rumor that one Thomas O'Grady had been brutally murdered and mutilated by a colored man named W. H. Morand, in the timber about one mile below that place. The rumor proved to be a sad truth, and not long after the body of the unfortunate man was brought to the village a coroner's inquest was held, and the principal facts given are as follows: The man Morand had leased a little piece of land in Cullinane's timber near Dexter, and had been living there for about two months. His hut was near the Michigan Central railroad track, and was made of saplings bent down and covered over with earth and brush. The boys in Dexter had found out he lived there, and on Sundays used to go up and chat awhile with him. On the day in question, Thomas O'Grady, Steve Cavanaugh, Thomas McLaughlin, Dan Cunningham and others—in all eight in number—had gone down from the village to see the man, and have a little fun with him. They arrived there, and commenced to fool around his humble abode, when he cautioned them to desist, but they still continued their sport, and one was so bold as to lay a large log against the door. This made Morand mad and he came out of the hut and picking up an ax struck a blow at Cavanaugh, who was the one nearest. Cavanaugh warded off the blow, and at the same time O'Grady said, "Don't be afraid, I'll fix him," or words to that effect, and pulling a revolver, fired in the air close to Morand's head, simply to make him desist his murderous intentions. This enraged Morand still more, and he struck again, this time at O'Grady, and felled him to the earth. The other boys were so paralyzed with horror, that they ran in all directions. O'Grady—though stunned by the blow—heard them and said, "For God's sake, boys, don't leave me." O'Grady was then on his knees in a stooping position, and as soon as he had said this, the negro struck him a second blow, which killed him instantly. With fiendish glee, he raised the bloody ax and dealt him two more blows, entirely mashing his skull, and mutilating his head in a fearful manner. He then took the dead body and carried it 10 or 15 feet and threw it over a fence into a ditch on the other side. The alarm was given immediately by O'Grady's companions, and his wife, being one of the first to hear of it, was soon on the spot, and found the negro trying to bury the fatal weapon that had performed the bloody work. Morand then walked toward the village, and meeting a couple of officers on the way, gave himself up. The officer, thinking that violence might be done him, took him to Ann Arbor the same evening. On the Wednesday following the prosecuting attorney questioned him in the presence of witnesses, drawing out the fact that he believed himself to be the Savior, possessing unlimited knowledge of past, present, and future, and therefore declined to prosecute the case. Morand was afterward taken before a jury, judged insane, and sent to Kalamazoo. The murdered man left a wife and a babe seven months old to mourn his sad and premature loss.

CHAPTER X.

POLITICAL.

Like all other intelligent communities in the United States, the people of Washtenaw county have participated with earnestness in the various political contests that have agitated the country at large, and have had also their own local political agitations. After the organization of the county in 1827, the first question of a political nature was that attending the abduction of William Morgan, a crime charged against the Masonic brotherhood, resulting in the formation of a powerful political party throughout almost every State in the Union, and known as the Anti-Masonic party. The Western Emigrant, established in Ann Arbor in the fall of 1829, after the publication of five numbers, passed into the hands of Samuel W. Dexter, who made it an organ of this new party, and for several years it was a strong advocate of the views of the Anti-Masons of the State, as well as of Washtenaw county. A correspondent of an Eastern paper under date December, 1829, in speaking of the political questions then agitating the people of the Territory, says: "The only parties dividing the people heretofore have been on account of names or rather partiality for the different prominent men whose names have been before the public for office. Some of their divisions, if I am not misinformed, have grown out of personal prejudice, originating, in all probability, from some petty misunderstanding among the great ones of the earth. These restless Republicans, as they boastingly style themselves, have got hold of a bone at present that will probably supersede the old feuds that have long existed. It seems that a few years ago a man by the name of William Morgan, of the State of New York, was carried off by men who were members of the Masonic institution, and concealed in some secure place (for attempting to publish the secrets of the order), and has not been heard of since. For this a certain part of the community charge those who carried him off with having murdered him; and assert that it was by the sanction and in accordance with the rules and practices of Masons generally; that they will break down the whole Masonic institution; that they will support none for office, and turn those out now in office, who are Masons. They are called Anti-Masons. The Masons, on their part, assert that if Morgan was murdered, it was done by men more zealous than wise, and without the knowledge or agency of the Masonic fraternity; that they wish the perpetrators of the deed the punishment they deserve; that an institution embracing in its ranks the most talented, patriotic and virtuous men of which America can boast, ought to repel with scorn the imputation of guilt thus attached to them; and that it is a mere electioneering story, set afloat by men of desperate fortunes, who hope to avail themselves of the just and laudable indignation such insinuations are calculated to excite in the community, to slide into office."

In 1831 Samuel W. Dexter was nominated as the Anti-Masonic candidate for delegate to Congress, against Austin E. Wing. The canvass was conducted with considerable spirit on both sides, and even with some bitterness. Those who were disposed to be neutral with reference to the claims of the Masons and Anti-Masons were denominated Jack-Masons by the latter. Mr. Wing was elected, though Washtenaw county gave Mr. Dexter a majority of 177 out of a vote of 590. The Anti-Masonic candidates for the Legislative Council in this county were elected.

In 1835 the Anti-Masonic element had almost disappeared, and only as members of the Van Buren, or Democratic, party, or of the Whig party, did they attempt to put in practice their peculiar views. The Emigrant having been disposed of, and the Michigan Whig taken its place, left the Anti-Masons without any organ. Notwithstanding Michigan was still without the Union, as much interest was taken in political affairs as if they were entitled to all the rights and privileges of a State. On the first Tuesday of October an election was held for members of the Legislative Council. The Van Buren, or Democratic, party, had a full ticket in the field, while the opposition, under the name of Republicans, also had a ticket. This last was not brought out until a few days before the election, and was beaten by the Van Buren party. The number of votes cast was 1,146.

In the spring of 1836, in the election of town officers, the Democrats and Whigs were divided upon the subject of the State Constitution, the former contending for holding the election under that instrument, the Whigs opposing. Where there was a Democratic board in a town, and they decided to transact the business as required by the State Constitution, the Whigs absented themselves from the polls, thus letting the election go by default.

In the fall of 1836 the questions dividing the people were in reference to the admission of the State into the Union,—whether the people of the State should submit to the terms proposed by Congress with reference to admission, or whether they should be rejected with scorn. The parties were arrayed under the names of "State's Rights" and "Submissionists." The canvass was spirited, and almost one-sided, the "State's Right" ticket carrying the county by an overwhelming majority.

At the spring elections in 1837 the parties were divided as Van Buren and Republican, the latter being victorious in three-fourths of the towns in the county. This division continued in the fall, the respective parties nominating full tickets. A State Convention of Republicans was held at Ann Arbor, August 2, nominating Charles C. Trowbridge for Governor, and other officers. At the August election for Member of Congress, the Republicans carried the county by 159 majority out of a total vote of 2,419. In order to rouse the Republicans of Ypsilanti, the Republicans of Ann Arbor challenged them to a gift of a public dinner if they should poll a larger Republican vote than Ann Arbor. Pet names, such as "Tory," "Federal" and others were freely bandied by enthusiasts. As illustrating the humor of the canvass, the Republicans circulated freely a paper called The Spy in Michigan, which professed to spy out the iniquities of the Democratic party. The Democrats, one night, proceeded to hang the Spy from one of the windows of the court-house, which created considerable merriment. The Republicans, to turn the tables on their Democratic brethren, published a burlesque article entitled "The Trial and Execution of the Spy," in which the leading Democrats of the county were made to testify in the case to their own discomfiture. The Republicans carried the county by 27 majority, out of a total vote of 4,105, larger than any vote previously polled in the county.

In 1838 the name Republican had generally been dropped and that of Whig assumed by the opposition to the Democratic party. The county was carried by the Whigs by a majority of 368. Michigan was now a State and entitled to all the rights attached to members of a common Union; therefore in the election of a Member of Congress much interest was felt in the political result.

The campaign of 1839 was merely a preliminary skirmish for the one the following year. The parties were the Democratic and Whigs, or Democratic Whigs, as some of the latter chose to be called. Conventions were called by the latter party under both names. William Woodbridge was the Whig candidate for Governor, and Elon Farnsworth the Democratic. Mr. Woodbridge's majority in the county was 516.

No political campaign since the formation of the Government has equaled that of 1840. The depression of the times which followed Jackson's administration, coming upon the country in that of Van Buren's, in 1837 and onward, prepared the people for the wild excitement and enthusiasm of this campaign. A change, by many, was deemed essential to the financial welfare of the people. The Whigs determined to make a desperate effort to obtain control of the Government, and the times were favorable for the accomplishment of their ends. The friends of the Administration were not to be outdone, and therefore followed a year of wild campaigning, the most furious excitement sweeping all over the country, and taking shape in processions, barbecues and other demonstrations which were calculated to captivate the people. Washtenaw county was no exception to the general rule, and hence there was a fierce contest for the political mastery. The campaign began early in the year, and grew in interest until the election in November. Harrison's majority in the county was 484.

Shortly after the election of Harrison, the question of slavery began to be agitated, resulting in the formation of a Free Soil party. The first ticket placed in the field by this party was in the spring of 1841. It polled 47 votes in the town of Ann Arbor. In November the Democrats, Whigs and Free Soil men each had tickets in the field, John S. Barry being the Democratic candidate, Philo C. Fuller the Whig, and Jabez S. Fitch the Free Soil. Mr. Barry carried the county by 355 majority. This was the first year in which the county went Democratic.

In 1842, the same division of parties existed. The Democracy again put forth a strong effort and succeeded in carrying the county over the Whigs by majorities ranging from 263 to 381 on their county ticket. The Free Soil party polled 311 votes.

In 1843, John S. Barry was the Democratic candidate for Governor, Zina Pitcher, Whig, and James G. Birney, Free Soil. After a strong canvass the Democrats succeeded in again carrying the county by a majority of 159.

In 1844, the Democratic, Whig and Free Soil parties were again arrayed against each other, under James K. Polk, Henry Clay and James G. Birney, respectively. The canvass, though in no sense to be compared with that of 1840, was yet somewhat spirited. Numerous speeches were made in behalf of the candidacy of each. Washtenaw county gave James K. Polk a majority of 201.

In 1846, Edwin Lawrence was the Whig candidate for Congress, Robert McClelland, the Democratic, and Charles H. Stewart, the Free Soil. Edwin Lawrence carried the county by a majority of 196.

At the election held November 2, 1847, Epaphroditus Ransom, the Whig candidate for Governor, carried the county by 43 majority.

The year 1848 brought with it a lively campaign. It was the year when General Taylor was the candidate of the Whig party for President, and General Lewis Cass candidate of the Democrats. Martin Van Buren was the candidate of the Free Soil party. Party lines were closely drawn and each side strived for victory. Lewis Cass succeeded in getting a majority of 52 votes in this county.

The year 1851 Robert McClelland was the Democratic candidate for Governor and Townsend E. Gidley, the Whig. Mr. McClelland received a majority of 119 votes in Washtenaw county.

The year 1852 was fraught with much deeper interest politically than that of '51. Franklin Pierce was the Democratic candidate for President, Winfield Scott of the Whigs, and John P. Hale, the Free Soil. The battle to the Whigs, almost from the first, was believed to be lost. The new Free Soil party was drawing heavily from their ranks, and the party was divided upon other questions. This county gave a Democratic majority of 329 out of a total vote of 5,482. Pierce was elected by an overwhelming majority, and the Whig party ceased to exist.

New questions now arose growing out of the American, or Know-Nothing excitement, and the agitation which attended the passage of the Nebraska bill, and the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. Those who were opposed to the further extension of slavery conceived that now was their time to act. The year 1854 is memorable in the annals of the country as the year in which the Republican party was born. The members of the old Free Soil, or Abolition party, as it was more generally known, quietly took their places in and became a part of the new party. Kinsley S. Bingham received the nomination of the new party for Governor, and John S. Barry the nomination of the Democrats. Full State and county tickets were nominated by both parties, and the fight for victory was fiercely contested. The new party was successful in this county, its candidate for Governor receiving a majority of 691.

In the year 1856 the national contest was waged between the Democratic, the Republican and the American parties. James Buchanan was the candidate of the Democracy, John C. Fremont of the Republicans, and Millard Fillmore of the Americans. The Republicans were victorious. The vote was the largest that had ever been cast in this county, the total number being 6,515; and the Republican candidates for State and county officers were all successful by majorities ranging from 546 to 875. The majority for Fremont was 736.

Political excitement became warm again in 1858. Moses Wisner was the Republican nominee for Governor, and Charles E. Stuart the Democratic. Wisner received a majority of 320.

The country was now becoming deeply moved over questions which stirred the popular heart as none had ever done before. The storm had been gathering ever since the repeal of the Missouri Compromise. The struggles in Kansas had deeply intensified the feelings of the people of the North, and John Brown's attempt at Harper's Ferry had been skillfully managed so as to arouse and heat the people of the South. That the Territories of the United States should be forever consecrated to freedom was the solemn determination of a large majority of the people of the North, and that the boundaries of the institution of slavery should not be further enlarged. The South, seeking its perpetuation by means of enlarged political power, determined that it should not be restricted, but should have enlarged privileges. The questions thus dividing parties was chiefly sectional, and pointed directly to war. In this state of the public mind, the Republican party met in National Convention and nominated Abraham Lincoln for President, and Hannibal Hamlin for Vice-President. The Democratic party met at Charleston, South Carolina, and the "fire-eating" element of the South, to better secure their object, the dissolution of the Union, broke up the Convention. The party afterward met in the city of Baltimore, and there the same turbulent element divided the Convention, and the result was the nomination of two Democratic tickets, Stephen A. Douglas and Herschel V. Johnson for President and Vice-President on the one side, and John C. Breckinridge and Joseph Lane on the other. The campaign was a most exciting one, and only equaled by the Harrison campaign of 1840. The majority for Lincoln in Washtenaw county was 656.

The campaign of 1862 was an important one. The Union arms had met with reverses, and a somewhat gloomy feeling pervaded the minds of the people. When the election came each party stood firmly by its candidates, for the campaign had aroused party feelings intensely. The Democracy were successful.

In the Presidential campaign of 1864, the war measures of the administration became the issues before the people, and the contest was one of much earnestness and depth of feeling. Abraham Lincoln was the Republican candidate for re-election to the Presidency, and associated with him on the ticket was Andrew Johnson, the distinguished Unionist of Tennessee. Gen. George B. McClellan and George H. Pendleton were the Democratic candidates for President and Vice-President. The result of the election was the second inauguration of Lincoln. McClellan obtained a majority of 204 in this county.

The election of 1864 practically settled the results of the war. The Confederacy collapsed in April, 1865. Lincoln having been assassinated, the reins of the Government came into the hands of Andrew Johnson. During his administration the great work of the Government was the "reconstruction" of the Southern States. The election in 1866 was fought upon this issue, the Democrats defending the President in his plan of reconstruction, the Republicans opposing. Henry H. Crapo was the Republican candidate for Governor, and Alpheus S. Williams the Democratic. The Republicans were successful in this county.

The year 1868 brought with it another Presidential campaign. The Republican National Convention met in Chicago, and nominated Ulysses S. Grant, the general of the army, for President, and Schuyler Colfax for Vice-President. The Democratic National Convention nominated Governor Horatio Seymour and Francis P. Blair, Jr., for President and Vice-President. The campaign was one of great activity. Each party was well organized, and both had great hopes of success. The issues between the parties were still such as arose from the work of reconstruction, especially as it affected the condition of the colored race so lately manumitted, together with the proposed taxation of the bonds of the United States, and their cancellation with legal tender notes instead of gold. Discussions on these questions took a wide range, and involved the attitude assumed by each toward the Rebellion, during its progress. The result of the election in this county was to give Seymour a majority of 33, while Isaac M. Crane, the Democratic candidate for Congress, had 137 over Austin Blair, Republican.

The next general election was in 1870, with Charles C. Comstock as the Democratic candidate for Governor, and Henry P. Baldwin the Republican. The Democrats were again victorious in the county, by an average majority of 200.

During Grant's first administration new issues were formed, and a new movement sprung up known as the Liberal Republican, which had large influence politically, and virtually dictated the Democratic nomination for the Presidency, in 1872, and the platform of principles on which the campaign against the Republican party was conducted. The Republicans nominated Grant for re-election, and the Liberal Republicans, Horace Greeley. The Democratic convention endorsed the nomination of Mr. Greeley, and accepted the platform on which he was nominated. It is but just to say that neither the ticket nor the platform furnished the Democracy by the Liberal Republicans was at all such a ticket or platform as that party would have chosen for itself, if it had pursued an independent course. The disaffection was so great that a third ticket was nominated, at the head of which was Charles O'Connor, the distinguished lawyer of New York. Many Democrats absented themselves from the polls, the consequence being that Grant was re-elected by an overwhelming majority. The Republicans were victorious in this county as well as in the Nation.

In 1874, the Democrats in the State and nation rallied and put forth an extraordinary effort, and succeeded in electing a majority of the national House of Representatives. The same zealous spirit that animated the party throughout the country was felt in this county. On their local ticket they carried the county by majorities ranging from 299 to 1,141.

During the four years of this administration, financial depression and business difficulties presented to the country the issue, largely, upon which the parties went before the country for its suffrage. Through these discussions and other influences arose a new party which was variously known as the "Anti-Monopoly," "Independent" and "Greenback." In National Convention it adopted the name of the National Greenback Labor party. In the contest of 1876 it did not figure very largely, only in a few States where it held the balance of power. The conflict was therefore between the two old parties, the Republican and Democratic. The Republicans nominated Rutherford B. Hayes, the Democrats, Samuel J. Tilden, and the Greenbackers, Peter Cooper. This was one of the closest elections ever held in the country, the result depending upon a single electoral vote. Each of the two great parties were determined to secure the prize. Disputes arose over the count of the electoral vote, but matters were finally adjusted by the appointment of an Electoral Commission consisting of 15 men, to whom this matter was referred. Their decision was in favor of Mr. Hayes by a vote of eight to seven. In this county the election was warmly contested and resulted in the choice by the people of the entire Democratic ticket.

The first county Prohibition Convention convened at Ypsilanti on Thursday, Sept. 21, 1876. The meeting was called to order by Charles Wheeler, of Ypsilanti; D. R. Shier, of Chelsea, was chosen chairman, and A. B. Hawkins, of Ypsilanti, was made secretary. A county prohibition committee was then selected, consisting of the following: Watson Snyder, Charles Wheeler, Charles McCormick, E. H. Jackson, Mrs. Ann W. Bassett, of Ypsilanti;

J. B. Russell, Augusta; Theodore Taylor, Ann Arbor; and W. K. Childs, of Pittsfield. A ballot was then taken for State Senator, and Representatives from the first, second and third district, resulting as follows:

State Senator—Eugene Laible, of Ypsilanti.

Representatives, first district—W. K. Childs, of Pittsfield; second district—Theodore Taylor of Ann Arbor; third district—E. Chubbuck, of Manchester. After the nomination had been confirmed, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, after which the convention adjourned:

Resolved, That as members of the Prohibition Reform Party of the county of Washtenaw, in convention assembled, we do heartily and emphatically endorse the declaration of principles as adopted by the National Convention at Cleveland, Ohio, and the nomination of Green Clay Smith, of Kentucky, for the Presidency, and Gideon T. Stewart, of Ohio, for the Vice-Presidency, of the United States, and hereby pledge to them our unflinching support.

Resolved, That we have implicit confidence in the integrity and ability of the several candidates for State officers of the Prohibition Reform Party of Michigan, and cordially accept the declaration of principles adopted by the State Convention.

Resolved, That we accept with pleasure the nomination the Hon. Peter R. Adams, of Tecumseh, as our candidate for Member of Congress from this Congressional District, and will give him our support.

Resolved, That in presenting our nominees for legislative officers, we are actuated by the eternal and unerring principle that right is better than might, and that right principles, honestly and persistently adhered to, will ultimately prevail.

In the campaign of 1878 four parties contested for the prize, the Republican, Democratic, Greenback and Prohibition. Full State and county tickets were nominated by each, the election resulting in the choice of the Republican candidates by fair majorities. The Prohibitionists polled 244 votes for their candidate for Governor.

The Presidential campaign of 1880 was warmly contested throughout the Union, with the possible exception of the State of Michigan. James A. Garfield was the Republican nominee for the Presidency, W. S. Hancock, the Democratic, J. B. Weaver, the Greenback, and Neal Dow, the Prohibition. Washtenaw county cast its vote for Hancock. The local ticket was divided, the Democrats carrying the greater number of the offices.

CHAPTER XI.

SOME OF WASHTENAW COUNTY'S ILLUSTRIOUS DEAD.

Death has no favorites; whether high or low, rich or poor, every human being is summoned once and must obey. The living continually mourn for the dead. In this chapter are given a few, and but a few, of the illustrious men and women of Washtenaw county who have passed away, and who, it is hoped, in brighter worlds, are in the full enjoyment of eternal happiness, and who wait for the coming of loved ones who yet remain this side of the "valley and shadow of death."

JOHN ALLEN.

John Allen, one of the founders of the city of Ann Arbor, was born in Augusta county, Virginia, May 17, 1796. His parents were James and Elizabeth (Tate) Allen, both of whom were native Virginians. The subject of this sketch spent his earlier life in his native State, and obtained there his elementary education. In January, 1824, he came to Michigan, and in company with E. W. Rumsay, penetrated the wilderness from Detroit to Washtenaw county, where the two located the site of Ann Arbor. Shortly after the location of the village Mr. Allen began speculating in land and laying out embryo cities. At one time he was the owner of many thousands of acres of land in the western part of the State. The hard times of 1837 affected him severely, and he went East to dispose of his land, but the dullness of the money market operated against him, entailing a great loss.

Mr. Allen was a man of an exceedingly hopeful disposition, and one of considerable force of character. Whatever he undertook, he brought to bear all the energies of his nature, and in every enterprise looking to the development of Ann Arbor he was in the lead. In company with S. W. Dexter, he published for a time the Western Emigrant, the first paper in Washtenaw county. He studied law with James Kingsley, and was admitted to the Bar in 1832, but gave but little of his time to his profession.

Mr. Allen was twice married. First, to Miss Mary Crawford, Nov. 2, 1815, in Virginia. Mrs. Allen was of an old family of that State. She died May 6, 1819. Second, to Mrs. Ann J. McCue, widow of Dr. William McCue, and daughter of Thomas Barry, of Londonderry, Ireland.

In 1850 Mr. Allen went to California, hoping in that famous country, to soon recover the fortune he had lost. But such was not to be the case, for on the 11th of March, 1851, he was called to his eternal home.

Mrs. Allen, on his decease, returned to Virginia, where she died Nov. 27, 1875, in the 79th year of her age.

HON. JAMES KINGSLEY.

James Kingsley was born in Canterbury, Windham county, Conn., on Jan. 6, 1797, and moved with his parents to Brooklyn in the same county, where he attended school till about 19 years of age. He then went to Providence, Rhode Island, where he studied Latin with a professor of Latin in Brown University. After finishing his Latin course he returned to Brooklyn where he studied law and was admitted to the Bar in that county. In 1823 he went to Virginia and was engaged as private teacher in the family of Ludwell Lee, son of the famous Richard Henry Lee.

He remained in Virginia until the winter of 1826, when he went to Mississippi, settling in the town of Grand Gulf. Shortly afterward, the yellow fever breaking out, he concluded to emigrate to Michigan, and learning that Ann Arbor was a new and thriving village in the Territory, he directed his steps hither. He came up the Mississippi and Ohio rivers by boat, landing at Cincinnati, where he purchased a horse and rode to Detroit. At the latter place he sold his horse and came on foot to Ann Arbor, reaching here in the fall of 1826. Upon arriving in the village of Ann Arbor he selected two lots of land about three miles north of this city, and returned the next day to Detroit and entered his lots in the land office there. He then returned here and began work by clearing on his land during that fall and winter five acres, devoting all his time to his land, as no court was held till January, 1827. At that time he commenced the practice of law here, being the first attorney admitted to practice at this Bar.

In 1830 he was married to Miss Lucy Ann Clark, a sister of Gen. Edward Clark, of this city. She died in 1856, and three children survive: Mrs. C. A. Chapin, of Ann Arbor; James and George Kingsley, of Paola, Kansas.

In 1828 Mr. Kingsley was appointed Judge of Probate, which office he held until 1836—eight years. From 1830 till 1833 inclusive, he was a member of the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, and March 3, 1831, he was appointed a Trustee of the University of Michigan. In 1837 he was a member of the Lower House of the State Legislature, and in 1838, 1839 and 1842 a member of the Senate. While a member of the Senate in 1842 he drew the charter of the Michigan Central railroad by which it went into operation—its first charter. In 1848 he was again elected a member of the House, and in 1850 was a member of the Constitutional Convention, in which he was on the Judiciary Committee, and occupied a prominent position in the proceedings and deliberations of the Convention. In 1852 he became Regent of the University, belonging to the first set of elected Regents, the Regents prior to 1852 having been appointed by the Senate upon the nomination of the Governor. This office he held for the full term of six years. In 1869-'70 he was again elected to the Lower House, which was the last official position held by him. He was also the second Mayor of Ann Arbor.

Judge Kingsley came to Michigan in 1826, just as the tide of population was beginning to flow into its Territory. He became a citizen here before the organization of the populous county of Washtenaw and when its present capital town had little more than a nominal existence. He was one of that band of noble, patriotic, enterprising and educated men, who, coming into the wilderness of a new country, laid the foundation for the State, and who will bear forever the worthy name of pioneer.

His life has been continued beyond that of most of his associates. Few of the early settlers of that day remain to speak his praise, or to drop a tear at his grave.

Although educated to the profession of the law and intending to devote his life to its practice, the field which he chose offered at the time of his settlement here little encouragement to the lawyer. No court had been here established; no business complications demanded professional services or judicial investigation. He was at the first session ever held by a Court of Record within the limits of the county. Although the last of his profession here who has fallen, his name stands inscribed first on the roll as the oldest and earliest member of the Bar. For more than fifty years he has been a prominent member of this community, sometimes engaged in professional labors, sometimes in more general business pursuits, and sometimes in the performance of official duties.

As a lawyer Judge Kingsley had little love for the technicalities of the profession. He knew nothing of the tricks of the pettifogger, and never soiled his hands with his practices. The labor of the office and the drudgery of the details in the preparation of causes were not much to his taste, but he was a true advocate of the great principles of the law. Right and justice always commanded his support, and in him they found an ardent and successful advocate. He was true as steel to his client, yet nothing could induce him by trick or chicanery to pervert the law. His efforts in the courts were always marked with ability and learning, but his best efforts were before the jury. Where he thought his client was the subject of oppression or of attempted injustice, he kindled with unwonted zeal, and his advocacy became both striking and powerful. His words of invective against the offender, on such occasions, were scorching, and his warm plea for justice—plain, simple justice—rung out in that eloquent tone which commanded the sympathy of all hearers. We can well remember such occasions, when these bursts of eloquence from his lips fell upon the ears of both jury and spectators with a power fascinating and almost irresistible.

Nor did the kindlier feelings fail sometimes to appear in these professional efforts. The play of his fancy and the sallies of his wit not unfrequently broke the dullness of the more grave and serious business at the court.

Judge Kingsley was honored by his fellow citizens with many offices of trust and authority. During eight years he was Judge of Probate, and for many years a member of the Legislative Council of the Territory, and afterward of the Legislature of the State. He has been Mayor of the city, a member of the Constitutional Convention and Regent of the University.

The confidence which the community always had in his capacity, and above all in his strict integrity and honor, made him ever a popular man. The free voluntary suffrage of his fellow-citizens thrust office upon him. The duties of his official life he performed diligently and conscientiously, and his retirement from office was without a stain upon his reputation, or the whisper of doubt as to the purity of his acts or his motives.

Judge Kingsley was a man of great simplicity of character. No display or show was ever exhibited by him. Although a man of more than ordinary stores of learning, and rich in the fruits of much philosophic reflection, it was never the subject of boast or show, and it is thought that few of his immediate acquaintances estimated him in that regard as highly as he deserved. He often exhibited the guileless spirit of a child. He would not suspect a wrong in others. He was kind and generous in his impulses, a true sympathizer with the poor and unfortunate, and a warm and sincere friend. The rough contact with the world seems to have affected him little, and the books which he read in his youth and the memory of his early friends remained dear to him to the last day of his life.

It was perhaps these traits of simplicity and sincerity and this character of integrity and honor which marked the course of his long life, which, more than anything besides, made him a popular favorite and knitted so strongly the tie that bound him and his more intimate friends together.

Judge Kingsley was politically a Democrat, and in many a campaign did yeoman service in behalf of the party, always making effective speeches from the platform, speeches well calculated to arouse the enthusiasm and stimulate the zeal of his hearers. As an official—judicial, legislative, or executive—he was ever true to the trust reposed in him, never bartering the interests of his constituents for personal gain. Ann Arbor is specially indebted to him for his early and earnest effort in locating, establishing and building up the University, and those of our citizens who knew him will long hold him in remembrance. The following tribute is from the pen of Judge Lawrence:

Judge Kingsley was among the first practicing lawyers in the county. He beheld the judiciary in its infancy as a Territorial court, under the administration of Judge Dexter, who obliged some culprits to swear to a plea of guilty, and witnessed its rise and progress through its various changes and gradations, until it had assumed a name and character inferior to none in this vast and mighty Union. In all these courts, from that of Justice of the Peace to the Supreme Court, he, as a member of the Bar, played his part and played it well.

His professional career was always honorable, just and manly. His word was as good as his bond, and it required no written stipulation to refresh his recollection; naturally truthful and honest, he had not learned how to prevaricate or evade, and in all his extensive practice no occasion ever arose to question his integrity or honor. As a practitioner he was without reproach and utterly incapable of meanness or chicanery. He was as honest in his profession as out of it. His integrity was too real to be bartered for temporary gain and too natural to be even tempted. It cost him no effort to be honest, but it was naturally impossible for him to be otherwise.

As a mere lawyer, Mr. Kingsley always held an honorable position. His mind was exceedingly acute and discriminating. In the trial of causes and in the scrutinizing of testimony no important fact ever escaped his notice. He was quick to see the strong points in his own case and the weak ones in that of his adversary. His discrimination and good judgment rarely allowed him to misapply the law to the facts.

He was a well-read and sound lawyer, and his judgment, aided by his common sense, rarely deceived his clients. While maintaining an honorable position as a lawyer, as an advocate and orator, in a certain class of cases, he, at the Bar of the county, was without a peer. Ridicule is sometimes the most effective argument that can be used, and when the state of the facts would allow it, no man ever better understood or wielded it, as a matter of defense, with more power or success. At the Bar and in deliberative assemblies Mr. Kingsley often resorted to this mode of defeating his opponent, and the recollection of many wonderful exhibitions of this faculty is still fresh in the minds of those who witnessed them.

No revenge, no malignity, accompanied those efforts, but a simple and genuine wit, characterized by an inimitable manner of delivery, carried all before it, courts, juries and public assemblies. His memory will ever be associated with those masterly efforts of real wit and genuine eloquence, and the day may be far distant when his equal shall again appear.

The deceased is entitled to the highest encomium that can be given to a human being—he was an honest man. In all his intercourse with men, both in his professional and individual capacity, there is and ever has been but one, and that is a universal, judgment in favor of his integrity; and perhaps all that might be said of his varied powers of intellect and the remarkable manifestations of his natural eloquence is far outweighed by a just estimation of his real character by the familiar though homely appellation on the tongues and in the hearts of all that knew him.—“Honest Jim Kingsley.”

Mr. Kingsley, after a long life of daily acts of kindness and friendship to all within his reach, lavished with a too liberal hand for his own aggrandizement, if that can be misspent which is expended for humanity, has finally left the earth without an enemy, and we trust in the life beyond the same faculties of mind and heart more fully developed will meet with equal success and appreciation in heaven.

HON. SAMUEL W. DEXTER.

Samuel W. Dexter was born in Boston in 1792, and was the eldest son of the distinguished statesman and advocate Samuel Dexter. After graduating at Harvard, he removed to Athens, on the Hudson river. From there he came to Michigan in August, 1824. He located in the vicinity of the present village of Dexter the same year; and in 1826 came with his family to reside in a house which he built on the bank of the River Huron, very near the present railroad depot in the village of Dexter. This house was used for many years as a place of worship for as many as four or five denominations, who there held at stated intervals regular service, and it was also a home for the different preachers who came to conduct the services.

Mr. Dexter established the first newspaper published in Washtenaw county, in 1829, at Ann Arbor. It was called The Emigrant.

In 1826 he was appointed Chief Justice of the County Court by Hon. Lewis Cass. He held the first court for the county of Washtenaw, at the house of Erastus Priest, in Ann Arbor, on the third Monday of January, 1827. In the same year he was solicited to become a Territorial delegate to Congress, but resigned all claims in favor of his friend, Major John Biddle, of Detroit, who was a brother of the famous Nicholas Biddle of United States Bank renown.

In 1831 Mr. Dexter, Austin E. Wing and John R. Williams were candidates for the office of delegate to Congress in the Territory of Michigan. Mr. Wing was the Democratic candidate. Mr. Williams was an independent candidate, and Judge Dexter was the candidate of the Anti-Masons. The vote in Washtenaw county resulted as follows: Mr. Dexter, 389; Mr. Wing, 227; Mr. Williams, 5; total vote in the county 621. The whole Territory vote was as follows: Wing, 3,188; Dexter, 2,100; Williams, 1,100; total vote 4,588. And it may be well to state here that Mr. Dexter ran upon the Free-Soil ticket for Congress about the time of the Kansas and Nebraska excitement. David Stuart was the Democratic candidate, and William A. Howard was the Whig candidate.

In 1826 Judge Dexter established a private postoffice in his own house, and carried mail on horseback to and from Ann Arbor once a week.

He located Saginaw City in the year 1825; and also Byron, Shiawassee Co.; and in the same year he entered lands in the vicinity of Tecumseh. He also made locations in other parts of the State.

Judge Dexter was an Anti-Mason, and an avowed temperance, as well as a thoroughgoing anti-slavery man. His positions on public questions seemed to have been chosen with an utter disregard to their popularity. The Anti-Masonic issue passed away, but his efforts in the cause of temperance never ceased; they took the form of promoting meetings, toward the expense of which he liberally contributed, and of unremitting efforts to aid and assist the families of drunkards, and restore their intemperate members to a correct life. He had no desire for office, and whenever he consented to lead a ticket, to be submitted to the suffrages of his fellow-citizens, it was because he thought he might be instrumental in maintaining a principle, rather than in reaching a place. When once convinced that a cause was right, so great was his disregard of the elements of opposition thereto, that he seemed almost incapable of estimating them. He never consented to determine the moral elements of any question by the number of people who favored or opposed it. And while it may be truly said that he was a poor politician, his course presented one of those spectacles of almost sublime attachment to what he thought to be sound principle, which are not over abundant in popular governments, but without which no reformations would ever begin. He knew little, and cared less, about the ordinary methods, or indeed any method of merely making money. His time was occupied with his books, and private and public charities, and the society of his friends. He was a fine scholar, because his studies did not terminate with the end of his college course. His fortune enabled him to supply himself with books at a time when they were beyond the reach of almost every one around him. He was an incessant reader, a graceful, and at times powerful, speaker, but the delight of his life was social converse; endless talk upon any subject brought forward, it mattered but little to him what. His reading and thought seemed to have traversed all subjects; and those who were nearest to him always thought his finest power was manifested in his most natural, but really graphic and affluent, conversations.

One peculiar feature of Mr. Dexter's character was born with him. He never invited familiarity, not because he was in feeling above anybody; on the contrary all his feelings and opinions ran in favor of the poor, oppressed and suffering. He was their constant advocate; yet there was that in the nature and make-up of the man that altogether without announcement or protest made any familiarity impossible.

No motives of policy, or persuasions of society, or any earthly consideration could bring him to compromise, either with individuals or the public at large, what he deemed to be a moral issue. This was the pole star of his life, by which all questions and conduct were regulated.

For the last twenty years of his life, finding that certain points of the country round about were not supplied with regular means of worship, he preached to the people in various school-houses.

Mr. Dexter died at the old homestead in Dexter, Mich., Feb. 6, 1863.

Hon. George Miles was born in Amsterdam, Montgomery county, N. Y., and was of old Puritan stock. He had to rely upon his own resources in early life, which tended greatly to develop his powers. He was admitted to the Bar in 1822 in his native State. In 1837 he removed to Ann Arbor, where he continued the general practice of his profession until appointed to the Bench in 1846, where he presided with great dignity. His reported opinions are noticeable for their ability, conciseness and close adherence to the points involved, and compare favorably with the early New York Reports. Judge Miles was possessed of an exalted character for integrity, and he was respected and esteemed by all. He died in the prime of life.

Hon. Wm. A. Fletcher was born in New Hampshire, his younger days being spent in the mercantile business in his native State. This was in 1813. About this time he removed to New York, where he studied law, and was admitted to the Bar. In 1821 he removed to Detroit, and in 1823 was appointed Chief Justice of the County Court of Wayne county. On the 17th day of April, 1833, the legislative council of the Territory established a Judicial Circuit, embracing all organized counties in the Territory, except Wayne, and Mr. Fletcher was appointed Judge of the Circuit. It being necessary for the Judge to reside in his district, he removed to Ann Arbor, where he continued to reside until his death. Upon the organization of the State, Judge Fletcher was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, which office he resigned in 1842. Judge Fletcher was possessed of a clear, discriminating mind, and was a very able lawyer. He died in August, 1853.

MUNNIS KENNY.

A well-known and honored citizen of Washtenaw county was Munnis Kenny, the fourth son of Deacon Moses and Abigail Kenny, who was born in Newfane, Vt., Dec. 10, 1788. At the age of 15 he was sent to the academy of Chesterfield, New Hampshire, with the view of preparing him for college. At the opening of the academy in his native town, he returned home and finished his course. He then entered Williams College, where he spent three years; then entering the senior class at Middlebury College, he graduated in 1809, at the age of 21. The same year he took the degree of A. B. in Williams College. After his graduation, he began the study of law with Judge White, of Townshend. While here he married Martha, daughter of Dr. John Campbell. He then located in Townshend, where he followed his profession for several years, being in the meantime honored with offices in the town, and for three years sent to the Legislature.

From Townshend Mr. Kenny went to Brighton, Mass., where he remained for several years. In 1829 he removed to Webster, Washtenaw county, Mich., and located 240 acres of land, which he at once proceeded to cultivate. Having spent all his life up to this time in intellectual pursuits, and in the society of the cultured and refined, it is not to be wondered he found much in pioneer life not congenial to his taste; but he did not hesitate in the work he set out to do—the providing of a comfortable home for his family. Hospitality was one of his ruling traits. The “latch string” at his house “was always out.” The new-comer was always welcomed, and assisted in finding a home.

In politics Mr. Kenny was an anti-slavery man, and lived to read the proclamation of Abraham Lincoln, remarking, as he did, that he was satisfied.

He was one of the founders of the Presbyterian Church, in Webster, and gave much of his time and the best energies of his life to the building up of the cause of Christ.

Mr. Kenny was the originator of the Washtenaw Mutual Insurance Company, and was for many years its secretary. In the office of the company hangs a fine portrait of him, as a remembrance of the good work done in the formation of the company.

Mr. Kenny was the father of seven children: Keyes, who died in early manhood; Eliza, wife of P. H. Reeves, who died at the age of 22; Martha, wife of William Babcock, who died at the age of 36; John, who lives on the homestead; Jane, wife of D. W. Taylor, of Jackson; Laura, wife of R. Queal; and C. Henry, who lives in Montcalm county. Mr. Kenny died in April, 1862, at the age of 74. The funeral services were held in the open air, the number in attendance being so great the church could not accommodate them. Mrs. Kenny is yet alive, and has for 15 years found a home with her son-in-law, R. Queal.

HON. WILLIAM S. MAYNARD.

William S. Maynard was born in Berkshire county, Mass., April 25, 1802, and at the time of his death, which occurred at nine o'clock p. m., June 18, 1866, was 64 years old. He came to Ann Arbor when but a very small village, in 1830, arriving about Sept. 1, of that year. Since that time up to within a few months of his death, he was actively engaged in business enterprises of various kinds, private and public. He was elected Mayor in 1856, '57 and '65, and in the meantime served one term as Alderman. As an officer he was energetic in the discharge of his duties, but failed to make himself as popular as he justly deserved, from the fact that he had no “policy element” in his nature, and had not learned that smooth words were, many times, better than hard ones. It was Mr. Maynard's energy, perseverance and determination that helped in a great way to bring the Washtenaw Agricultural Society up to its present high standard, and for the unselfish devotion he displayed in assisting in the permanent location, purchase and ownership of the valuable grounds in Ann Arbor. Mr. Maynard had also been connected with the School Board and with the Cemetery Board from the organization of the company; and at various times had been identified with almost every public enterprise that could be named. It is safe to say that he has done as much as any other man, perhaps more, to promote the growth of the beautiful city in which he resided. Mr. Maynard had attended worship at the Congregational Church, of which he was a member, on the Sunday preceding his death, and in the evening appeared more cheerful than usual. He went to bed at the usual hour, appearing a little more restless than usual, and in the morning his wife found him sleeping quietly, and did not go near him again till about eight o'clock, when she noticed he did not breathe easily, and attempting to rouse him failed. Medical aid was immediately summoned, and every exertion used to resuscitate him, but he lingered, unconscious all the while, till nine o'clock P. M., when his spirit left this earthly home and winged its flight to that "far beyond." Mr. Maynard left a widow, seven daughters, a step-son, a brother, and a large circle of relations to mourn in common the loss of husband, father, brother and friend.

JOSHUA G. LELAND.

Hon. Joshua G. Leland was born in Madison county, N. Y., July 19, 1805, and died April 27, 1876, thus making his age nearly 71 years. He spent the earlier years of his life at his native place, and was married in 1827. In 1831 he removed to Michigan and settled in the town of Ann Arbor; and one year later removed to the township of Northfield, where he continued to reside up to within a few years of his death, when he removed to the city of Ann Arbor. His energy and force of character were very marked, and he was always busy, even to the last days of his life. Other men retired from business when the infirmity of old age overtook them, but Mr. Leland kept right on. He was noted for his perseverance. Whatever he undertook he pushed forward, and when he believed he was right, and had arrived at his conclusions, he maintained his position. He was an outspoken, fearless man, and what he said to one he would say to another. His plainness of speech often brought him into opposition with others, but it is doubtful if he had an enemy in the county. He was a successful business man and farmer, and had accumulated a goodly amount of this world's goods. In the course of his life he held various responsible and honorable offices, conferred upon him by the people. He was Justice of the Peace in Northfield for many years, and was twice elected to the State Legislature, in 1840 and '44. He was once president of the Washtenaw County Agricultural Society, President of the Farmers' Insurance Company, and of the Pioneer Society. He has been closely identified with many public interests in the county, and perhaps no man was more missed than he. Mr. Leland was a religious man, having been converted at his home in Northfield in 1834. Soon afterward he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he remained a faithful member up to his death, and held positions of trust in the Church. The cause of his death was of an odd nature. He was in his barn about 10 days before his death, and seeing a rat, attempted to kill it with the sharp prongs of a pitch-fork he held in his hand, but missed his aim, and the rat ran up the handle of the fork and bit him on the hand. His arm and hand swelled rapidly and he had to take his bed, from which he never rose again. Washtenaw county mourns another old pioneer who has passed to the land of rest prepared for him.

REV. CHARLES G. CLARK.

Mr. Clark was born in the town of Preston, Conn., April 8, 1796. At the age of 25 he was hopefully converted and immediately commenced studying for the ministry. He received his college education at Amherst College, Mass., where he graduated in 1827, and immediately entered the Auburn Theological Seminary and completed his education in 1829. He was ordained in the summer of 1829 by the Oneida Presbytery. Although he was offered several desirable positions in the State of New York, he preferred a new field of labor and came to the new Territory of Michigan, arriving in Detroit on Saturday, Sept. 29, 1829, and preached his first sermon in the State at that place on the day following. From Detroit he immediately went to Monroe, where he preached a few weeks and then came to Ann Arbor. After supplying the pulpit of the Presbyterian Church for a few weeks, in the absence of their pastor, he located in the town of Webster, where a Church was formed soon after. He labored at Webster during his entire active ministry with the exception of three or four years.

Although located at Webster, his labors extended to all the adjacent towns, and many of the churches in this vicinity were organized by him. When he arrived in the Territory, there were but four Presbyterian and Congregational ministers within its bounds, and he was fully identified with the pioneer work in this vicinity. On account of failing health he was obliged to resign his charge about 13 years since, and for the last 11 years he resided in this city.

Mr. Clark was a man of strong and earnest feelings, quiet and unobtrusive in his manner, and universally esteemed and loved by those who knew him best. He died in Ann Arbor, Oct. 2, 1871.

REV. I. M. WEED.

BY MRS. MARK NORRIS.

Ira Mason Weed was born in Hinesburgh, Vermont, Jan. 14, 1804. He was the ninth of a family of 11 children. He prepared for college with his brother-in-law, Rev. Mr. Johnson, of Hopkinton, N. Y., and entered the University of Vermont, at Burlington, in the sophomore year, graduating in 1825; after which he entered the law office of Judge Fine, in Ogdensburgh, N. Y., where he remained a year. It was during this period that his attention was particularly called to religious subjects, and his conversion took place. Immediately his thoughts were turned toward the ministry, his law studies were abandoned, and he soon after entered Andover Theological Seminary, going through the whole course of three years. In the spring of 1829 he was licensed by the association at Andover, to preach the gospel. From a private journal, kept during his residence at Andover, I have been permitted to make a few extracts. In this journal he seems much exercised in regard to a right choice in his field of labor. In all these deliberations his mind turned constantly to the West. The destitution of gospel privileges in the vast region beyond the Alleghanies deeply affected his ardent mind. I quote from the journal mentioned: "June 29, 1828, Sabbath, p. m.—I have to-day listened to two sermons by the Rev. Dr. Peters, of the American Home Mission Board." The sermon of the afternoon seems to have made a deep impression. "Text, Oct. 9: 'Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?' In the discourse the destitution of our own land was brought to view, and the students urged to make the text their daily prayer. I have felt for some time that it would be a privilege to labor for Christ somewhere in this great field. I feel it not only a privilege, but I have a desire to go if it be the Lord's will. I hope I have a heart to mourn over the great destitution in our country, and to pray, Lord, raise up and send more laborers into the fields already white for harvest. Lord, what wilt thou have me to do in regard to this subject? This I would make my sincere prayer." Similar reflections and earnest thoughts on this subject are scattered all through the pages of this journal; and not only this, but the subject of foreign missions lay near his heart, and commended itself to his best efforts. Yet, from so frequent allusions to the missionary department of the West, no doubt can remain of the settled purposes of his soul. June 20, 1829, he again writes: " * * * I long to be on the ground. Whenever I think of the millions there, growing up without any religious restraint, my soul is pained. May the Lord give me strength and grace for this holy work, and send me in the way in which I can do the most good." Again, June 27, same year, he writes: "And now, having given myself up to the work of a missionary, it is my sincere desire and prayer that I may have the spirit of a true missionary—the spirit of Christ. I do not expect a life of ease. I know that I must have trials and hardships. Oh for grace to endure these hardships as a good soldier." Writing again, Sept. 23, 1829, on the eve of his ordination, he says: "The long anticipated day is come, and is past. * * * I feel now as though I were about to step forth in the world. The responsibility of a minister of reconciliation now rests upon me, and oh, who can bear up under its weight! To-morrow I expect to be ordained as a missionary to the West. Oh for the spirit of him who was ordained a missionary to this guilty world! 'My grace is sufficient for thee.' This promise will I cleave to: 'Lo, I am with you alway.' The fulfillment of this will I ever plead." During the winter of 1829-'30, he preached in various localities in New England, in one of which he was urgently solicited to remain as their pastor; but he could not be diverted from the path already indicated, viz., to go West.

In May, 1830, he was married to Miss Caroline N. Dutton, of Hillsborough, New Hampshire, and came immediately to Ypsilanti, arriving early in June. At that time the few members of the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches (13 in number), who had entered into covenant in the previous autumn, were living widely apart in the settlements surrounding the new village—two, four, and six miles, sometimes more. They had to walk, or, at best, take the most primitive modes of conveyance, to get to the village. I cannot now recall one family living in town who were fully in sympathy with the Presbyterian Church. The number of professing Christians of any denomination was small indeed. The young minister and his wife found here a mixed population. Many good people; some bad. Society was then in a transition state, like many new country towns. Whisky drinking and profanity were looked upon as venial sins, and the Sabbath was thought to be "more honored in the breach than in the observance" by too many. Having been expected for several weeks, he received a welcome from those who waited for his coming. One of his first public acts, where he mingled with the whole people, was to take part in the patriotic celebration of Independence Day,—July 4, 1830,—making a prayer. The oration was given by the late Elias M. Skinner. After the address, dinner was served in the grove on the ground now owned and occupied by the family of Chauncey Joslin. He entered at once upon his chosen work of preaching, both by precept and example, and in an eminent degree illustrated in his daily life the truths he constantly sought to inculcate.

In no department of his labor was his influence more powerfully exerted than over the minds of the children gathered into the Sunday-school, of which he was for many years a faithful superintendent. Many of the Sunday-school children of that day are now among our best Christian people. Many others have gone to other States, where their good influences are still at work. One of these children is now a missionary in Northern India, sent from the church so long blessed with the labors of this pioneer minister. Nothing more plainly illustrates the fact that our influence cannot die. May this dear sister be enabled to keep that wave of influence, received from her pastor and teacher, rolling, going forward, until the end! There were some persons then resident here who felt the influence of this new minister, and rebelled against it. They aroused no little opposition, not wishing the light of the gospel let in on their practices. This, however, did not alarm the calm and fearless minister. He sometimes preached when stones were thrown in at the windows of the old "Red School-house"—the place where the people then assembled. Often, when riding in the darkness to meet an evening appointment in the outlying neighborhood, he has been threatened with rough treatment by the way; but nothing moved him from the purpose he had in view. In common with many others at that period, himself and family suffered much from the fevers and diseases incident to the opening of this new country; so it was in the midst of much hardship and many privations that he toiled on, laying broad and deep the foundations of that Church whose welfare always remained so near his heart. Sharing with his people all the self-denials of the situation, he often combined the duties of the pastor with those of the sexton; and the writer has known, on a Saturday night, of his taking wood from his not largely furnished pile, for warming the meeting-house next day. He sometimes made the fires and saw that the place was comfortable. It must be remembered that in those days evening service commenced at "early candle-lighting." No bell called the worshippers together, but with one accord in one place they gathered together in their own school-house. No one could say with truth the preacher was not in earnest; his singleness of heart and earnest manner could but impress the most careless listener.

Personal ambition had no place in his purposes or plans of life. And while forgetful of self, seeking for his people the best gifts, he was at the same time securing not only the respect and esteem of his own people, but of the community outside of Church relations. Said a business man, "If Mr. Weed's capabilities and judgment had been applied to getting a living, he might have been a rich man." We all know what a home missionary's salary was in those days. With the aid of the Home Missionary Society, the scattered congregation succeeded in raising four hundred dollars. With this, economy might keep the wolf from the door, but how many luxuries would it procure? Times are changed for the better now, and better salaries are provided. Ministers, we believe, do not feel obliged to receive the bag of potatoes, or the ten pounds of pork, "on subscription;" but in most towns the people are able to let the minister and his wife select for themselves. In all hardships he complained not, but cheerfully went forward, neglecting no known duty, in advancing the religious interests of the people. His labors in the surrounding country deserve grateful mention, as we to-day are reaping the benefits of this faithful work. Morning and afternoon sermons, Sunday-school in the intermission, and generally a prayer-meeting at 5 o'clock, it was the Sabbath work of summer; while the evenings of a large portion of the year were devoted to preaching in Deacon Bacon's neighborhood, or Deacon Carpenter's locality, or Deacon Hatfield's place, at Stony Creek, or again out east on the plains; whenever one, though he never came to the house of worship, would open his house for religious meetings, there he was sure to be. Said a minister who had traveled extensively among the Churches: "There is no Church of our denomination in the State which is so strong in membership from the country as Ypsilanti. It is probably owing to the labors of your first minister, who made it his business to go out and gather them in."

In October, 1834, Mr. Weed was installed permanent pastor. All, I believe, then hoped this relation to the Church would be sustained through life. Previous to this time the congregation had engaged in erecting a new house of worship. In this work the perseverance and good judgment of the pastor was seen by his entering into the spirit of the enterprise, and assisting in plans for raising means to help forward their labor. It must be remembered that money and means were not as plenty in 1834-'5 as now; few were rich, and most business men were engaged in speculations of various kinds, requiring all the means at their command.

Accidentally I lately found among my husband's papers a bundle of records, receipts, notes and accounts, with any amount of "subscription papers" for various objects,—all relating to this time, and many of these memoranda are in Mr. Weed's handwriting, going to show how earnest he was in helping to encourage the people to build. In the winter of 1836 a very precious revival took place. The old Red school-house became a very Bethel indeed. Fifty members were added to the Church, and all hearts were quickened in love for their pastor and for each other. They had now—pastor and people—occupied the school-house as a place of worship for over six years; many precious seasons had been passed there, and it was with mingled feelings, near the end of 1836, they prepared to bid the place farewell. In November the new church was finally completed, and dedicated to the service of that Almighty Father who had led them hitherto.

I have spoken of the small salaries home missionaries received in those early times. I hope no one of the present day will misunderstand me. The necessity was imperative, owing to the sparse population, and the uncultivated state of the country. The Home Missionary Society was created to meet the necessity of the new district. No debt was ever more cheerfully cancelled, and with manifold interest, too, than has long since been done by the Church and society. I have sufficient data to record the fact that the pastor's salary was gradually increased as the circumstances of the congregation improved. I find in the bundle of old records referred to, "several subscription papers" "for the support of the Gospel," in which Mr. Weed's name is mentioned. July 8, 1844, at a meeting held in the church, it was "voted to pay Rev. I. M. Weed $600 for the ensuing year." July, 1845, at a similar meeting, "voted that $600 be raised to pay the pastor—to be paid in quarterly payments." By this it appears that $600 a year was the maximum of compensation received during his ministry with the Ypsilanti Church, over a period of more than 17 years. Families of growing children could hardly be supported at present for this sum. Times have indeed changed; we must always hope for the better. Early in the autumn of 1845, while suffering, himself and family, from continued illness, Mr. Weed asked leave of absence for a year, to visit again the New England hills, hoping to return with restored health. A meeting was called, leave was granted, and resolutions passed expressing confidence and fidelity to the pastor, and a warmly expressed wish for his speedy return. A restful visit with their kindred in the Eastern States, some travel, and a quiet sojourn during the winter in Pittsford, Vermont, served to restore him to comparative health. The Church at Pittsford were without a resident minister, and Mr. Weed was strongly urged to remain and fill the position. But, attached to Michigan, and drawn back to his own people, he prepared to return.

It was, I believe, early in the spring of 1846, he was surprised by receiving a letter from a small minority of the Church members, stating their belief that the interests of the Church and society required that the relation then existing between himself and them should be dissolved; that it was their opinion the only way for the question to be disposed of, so as not to hazard a division of the Church, was for him to signify to the society his determination not to return! At the same time they assured their pastor that if, contrary to their feelings, he should still determine to return, they would offer no open opposition. No one who knows how well Mr. Weed was posted on Church order and propriety of proceeding regularly, would believe that, however his feelings might be hurt, they were all suppressed; and he did return, but with kindly heart toward all. I need not say that the large majority of the society were filled with grief on being made aware of this movement.

Relative to the spirit of the pastor, I will quote a few sentences from a letter dated New York, July 4, 1846, written to my husband. After speaking of the right each person had of expressing opinion, he said: "I hope my people will cherish no unkindly feeling toward those who do not desire my return. That they felt kindly toward me I have no doubt. I trust they still feel so. Whether they do or not, they have a right to their opinion, and a right to express it, in a kind manner. This I have no doubt they intend to do. * * * On my return I hope to show I cherish no hardness toward any, and that my kind feelings are not interrupted. I do hope the Church may continue to prosper. If in the providence of God I should feel I ought to leave, I hope none will leave the Church on this account." I pass over this period with little comment. That many hearts were riven, cannot be denied. A small number had arisen "who knew not Joseph;" he was not their "first love." They had brought earlier preferences; assuming the old proverb to be true, that "change of pasture makes fat calves," wished merely for a change. Those most interested in wishing a change have now passed from earth—gone where mistakes are rectified, hidden providences made plain. We will hope however any may have differed in regard to the events of this time, they may have had grace given meet for repentance for all errors in life. Mr. Weed returned near the close of July.

I pass over the meetings held. At first the large majority in the Church and society thought he would remain. But the not "open" opposition did not subside, until finally, in the summer of 1847, he himself joined those wishing him to leave, in asking the Presbytery to dissolve the relation. This was accomplished with great effort, and by the barest majority. A short time thereafter, in October, 1847, Mr. Weed removed with his family to Chicago, Illinois. On the Sabbath previous to leaving he preached his farewell sermon, from the text: "Wherefore, I take you to record this day, that I am pure from the blood of all men; for I have not shunned to declare unto you all the counsel of God." Who that listened to the tender, loving words of that sermon, can forget while life lasts?

Of the leave-taking, and the breaking up of long-existing ties, I forbear to speak. As soon as the family were settled comfortably in Chicago, Mr. Weed entered on an agency for the American Board of Foreign Missions, becoming District Secretary for the Northwest. This field included Northern Illinois, Iowa, Wisconsin and Minnesota, as far as their population extended. In 1847-'8 there was hardly a railroad out of Chicago. Here was pioneer life to encounter again! long, lonely drives over "slews" and deep prairie mud, to reach a shelter at night with the new settlers. The Churches were most of them feeble, but he laid strong foundations in benevolent work. There is abundant evidence of his excellent influences upon the Churches he visited during these eight or ten years, while in the service of the American Board.

But the work was too laborious for one who, like him, suffered both with the bilious diseases of the country, and also with local lameness. It will be remembered by those who knew Mr. Weed that he used a cane, and was frequently very lame. In childhood he suffered from a fever, which on his recovery left a deposit in his leg near the ankle. This resulted in what is called in common parlance, "fever sore." It could sometimes be healed for a time, then, becoming inflamed, it would "break out" again with renewed violence. From this cause alone Mr. Weed was a frequent sufferer, and the work in which he was now engaged, though all-absorbing, was too hard for his physical well-being. All his life this was his "thorn in the flesh." He had another trial. No man was happier in his home; in the domestic circle his joys seemed to center. In regard to the agency he would say: "I shall never love to be away from home; I have lived at home too long for that." Another trial was to be divorced from his study, and to be, as he often termed it, a wanderer on the earth. In a brief note, dated Jan. 1, 1848, alluding to what Mrs. Weed had written relative to the family having severed their relations with the church at Ypsilanti and becoming members of the Second Church of Chicago, he says:

"My truant thoughts, like wife's, have been straying to-day; and with hers have gone back to Ypsilanti. To control my emotions, I have found it necessary to command them back. Still the place and the friends there I can never forget, nor can I forget the Church; and why should I? However much I may have come short, or failed in my duty to it, I think I can truly say that I have desired its prosperity, and hope I have a heart to be glad if I should be permitted to hear of its advancement through the instrumentality of others. There is no place other than Ypsilanti that seems like home. Very likely I have become inordinately attached to the place and the people, and perhaps it was for this that my peaceful and happy connection with them should be interrupted and broken up. Sure I am that since this has been done I have felt more like a stranger and pilgrim. The wandering life of an agent is a great trial to me, and very probably is the one trial that I needed. May it be sanctified to my good, and to the Churches which I visit.

"Yours truly,
I. M. WEED."

Several years after, Mr. Weed assumed the agency of an educational enterprise located at Lake Forest. One of his daughters said to me: "While engaged at Lake Forest, and we living at Waukegan, to human view he seemed to keep the Church together. Coming from Chicago at night very weary, to take charge of the prayer-meeting, and notwithstanding his exhausting labors through the week—preaching on the Sabbath for a long time, and freely offering so much of strength as he had to give to these labors, without compensation, this while they were without a pastor." In Grandville, Illinois, he was a faithful preacher and pastor for four years, gaining the love of all. He has now made his home in Illinois for 20 years; still his affection for his early home and people in Ypsilanti was not diminished. His love for them was fully returned, and often had he been solicited to give himself a partial rest from exhausting labor, return with his family, and here end his days in the midst of those whose attachment to their earliest pastor had never faltered. He complied with the request, and six or seven years ago made his home again in the midst of early friends. Before his family had hardly got settled in their new house, the old pioneers hastened to give them what in these days is called a "surprise party," but in pioneer days was simply a "donation visit." They left substantial tokens of their continued regard, and after partaking of elegant refreshments, each returned with enlarged feelings of regard for their old friend's return.

I pass over a few more years, during which, with somewhat renovated health, the early minister found work to do for the Master, still ever ready "to bless, to comfort and command," in all departments of Christian work. I come now to the close of this good man's life, a life of "faith and works."

I have already made this sketch longer than I intended. Mr. Weed was unexpectedly taken ill on returning from church Sabbath afternoon, and, after a severe illness of 10 or 11 days, died, calm and peaceful, taking leave of all his family, and with a clear, distinct voice, saying, "Though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I fear no evil; for thou art with me, thy rod and thy staff they comfort me." His last words were, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." He went to his heavenly rest on the night before Thanksgiving, 1871. On the following Monday his remains were laid in Highland Cemetery, beside three infant children already gathered into the folds of the Good Shepherd. A substantial monument with fitting devices—an open Bible resting on a desk—adorns his grave. Mr. Weed left a wife and four children. Two daughters remain with their mother at their pleasant home; a son, Ira M. Weed, and daughter (Mrs. Rowley), both having families of their own, reside at Cedar Rapids, Iowa. Of Mrs. Weed it is sufficient to say she was worthy to be the wife of such a man.

PROF. JAMES C. WATSON.

James Craig Watson was born in Middlesex, now Elgin, county, Canada West, June 28, 1838. His parents removed from Northumberland county, Pennsylvania, to this place, some time previous to his birth. From here his father removed with his family to Michigan and located in Ann Arbor. Professor Watson was essentially a self-made man. By industry and self-denial he secured the means which permitted him to obtain a college education. All that he has become, all the reputation that he has attained, is due to his indomitable perseverance, and to the determination with which he set himself to surmount the obstacles which stood in his path. Professor Watson graduated at Michigan University with high honors in 1857, and was the first pupil of the famous astronomer, Dr. Brunnow, who was then Director of the Observatory and Professor of Astronomy in the University of Michigan. Soon after his graduation, in the year 1858, he was appointed Instructor in Mathematics, in the University, and Assistant Observer. In 1859, upon the retirement of Professor Brunnow, Mr. Watson was appointed Professor of Astronomy, which position he held during the college year 1859-'60. In the latter year he accepted the chair of physics in the University, which he held for three years. He was then appointed Professor of Astronomy and Director of the Observatory, upon the recommendation of many of the leading astronomers of the country. Although only 25 years of age his abilities and pre-eminent qualification for this responsible position had already won recognition, and even thus early had he given evidence of the future eminence to which he was to attain. These positions he held until 1879, when he resigned them to accept a similar place in Madison University, Wisconsin, where very great inducements and superior facilities were offered him. During his long directorship of the observatory here, although only 25 years of age at the time of his appointment, the list of discoveries and contributions made by him form a record of which any university might be proud.

Professor Watson was elected a member of the National Academy of Sciences in 1867; of the American Philosophical Society in 1877; of the Royal Academy of Sciences, Catania, Italy, in 1870. He was the discoverer of 23 asteroids, for which he received in 1870 the gold medal of the French Academy of Sciences. In 1875 he received from the Khedive of Egypt the decoration of Knight Commander of the Imperial Order of the Medjidich of Turkey and Egypt. He was appointed Judge of Awards in the Centennial Exposition. He received the degree of Ph. D. from the University of Leipsic in 1870, and from Yale College in 1871. In 1877, Columbia College conferred upon him the degree of LL. D.

Professor Watson was the discoverer of 23 asteroids and two comets,—April 29, 1856, and Jan. 9, 1864. On Oct. 20, 1857, he also discovered, independently, the planet afterward named Aglaia, and on Jan. 9, 1864, one afterward called Io; but it subsequently proved that these discoveries had been anticipated by a few days in Europe. He was placed by the Government of the United States, in charge of the expedition to Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, to observe the total eclipse of the sun in 1869; was sent to Carlantina, Sicily, for a similar purpose in 1870, and to Peking in China, in charge of the expedition of 1874, to observe the transit of Venus. The notes of his observations on the latter expedition are very voluminous and valuable. They have not yet been published. The last and most noted of Professor Watson's discoveries, was that made in July, 1878, in Wyoming, of the existence of one and probably two intra-Mercurial planets. Always a firm believer in Leverrier's theory of the existence of Vulcan, he had the satisfaction on this expedition of proving its positive existence, and of obtaining convincing proof to himself at least of the existence of still another intra-Mercurial planet of lesser magnitude.

Prof. Watson died at Madison, Wis., Tuesday, Nov. 23, 1880, while in the prime of life, when a future of great usefulness seemed open before him. Prof. C. K. Adams says of him: "In the death of Prof. Watson science has lost one of its greatest lights and the University of Michigan the most illustrious of its alumni. Wherever astronomy is a science the name of Watson has become familiar to every scholar. His fame has spread not only over America and Europe, but his services have been sought and his labors rewarded by nations on the opposite side of the globe, where science is but little known. It is no disparagement either to the living or the dead to say that in the peculiar sphere of his intellectual activity he has probably had no superior in the history of this country. With all Professor Watson's genius he united the modesty of the most genuine scholarship. His name was much more frequently spoken in scientific circles than in popular society. During the last years of his life he even left the announcement of his discoveries to the scientific journals and societies to which alone he contributed. For many years he was a regular contributor of the most prominent scientific journals of Europe and America, and by these journals many of his discoveries were first announced."

VOLNEY CHAPIN.

The name of Chapin can be found in the early history of Massachusetts. Deacon Samuel Chapin, the progenitor of all who bear the name in this country, removed with his family from Boston to Springfield in 1642. Oct. 10, 1652, he was appointed one of the magistrates of Springfield.

Gad Chapin, the grandfather of V. Chapin, served in the Colonial war against the French and Indians, and held a commission as Captain from King George III. He settled in Bennington, Vt., and in the Revolution served with the Vermont troops. In 1789, with his family, he emigrated to Otsego county, N. Y., and settled in the town of Burlington, about 12 miles from Cooperstown. Dan Chapin, the father of V. Chapin, was born in Bennington, Vt., June 16, 1768.

Volney Chapin (the subject of this sketch), son of Gad and Deborah (Wright) Chapin, was born in Burlington April 21, 1803. His early years were spent upon a farm, working in summer and going to school when he could; his opportunities for an education were very limited. When 17 years old he was apprenticed to the blacksmith's trade, but not liking his master he ran away and went to Moravia, N. Y., where he became an apprentice in the furnace of Jethro Wood, the reputed inventor of the cast-iron plow. After learning the trade and working a few years as journeyman, his first business venture was at Ogdensburg, N. Y., where he carried on a furnace in partnership with George Ward, of Moravia. He continued in business until the summer of 1831, when, with his wife and son (Charles A.), he removed to Rochester, N. Y., and established a furnace which he carried on until the spring of 1833. In June of that year, with his family, he emigrated to Michigan, and settled in Ann Arbor. Here he bought the furnace of Samuel A. Sperry, which had just gone into operation. He formed a co-partnership with Jonathan Hussey, Esq., of Moravia, N. Y., which continued about ten years, the firm being V. Chapin & Co.

All the coal and iron used up to 1839 was brought from Detroit by wagons, and such was the condition of the roads that it took from four to six days to make the round trip. The price of anthracite or hard coal at Detroit in those days was $24.00 per ton. From a small beginning the business grew to be large and successful. Their plows and mill machinery were sent into the adjoining States and they made the gearing and machinery for most of the mills in this State. From 1843 to 1846 Mr. Chapin was sole owner, employing sixty men in the manufacture of plows, mill machinery, saw-mill engines and boilers, threshing-machines and separators, stoves, etc. In the summer of 1846 he sold one-half of his business to a man named Loomis. The firm name was Chapin & Loomis. A few years later Chas. Tripp was admitted and the firm was then known as Chapin, Tripp & Loomis. In 1859 he sold his share in the concern to Mr. Tripp. The property now belongs to Ailes & Gretten.

In 1844, in connection with George Ward (his old partner at Ogdensburg), he built the "Spring Mills" now owned by Swathel, Kyer & Co. In 1846, with his brother-in-law, Col. Dan'l D. Sloan, he bought the water-power of Judge S. W. Dexter known as the "Yellow Mills," on which he built the "Dover Mills," now owned by Thos. Birket. In 1851 he bought one-half of the paper mill in the lower town of J. H. Lund; this interest he sold next year to his son Chas. A. In 1854 he came into the firm and helped build the Geddes paper mill. The firm then was Lund, Chapin & Co. The firm name was changed several times up to 1865, when it was known as Chapin & Co. The mill in the lower town was burned, that at Geddes sold and the business was discontinued.

Mr. Chapin was also largely interested with his son Volney and F. E. Jones. The firm was known as Jones, Chapin & Co. They carried on the stove and coopering business at Niles and Decatur, Mich., Michigan City, Ind., Chicago, Ill., and Davenport, Iowa. He retired from the firm a few years before he died. On the death of Volney, Jr., in 1872, the business was discontinued.

His business in salt and lumbering in the Saginaw Valley was very extensive. He dealt largely in pine lands, and at one time owned six thousand acres. Chapin township, in Saginaw county, is named after him. He built several saw and shingle-mills on his property. He was also connected with other manufacturing enterprises.

To Mr. Chapin the present wealth and development of Washtenaw county is largely due. The pioneer farmers acknowledge their indebtedness to him for his generosity and assistance in the days of privations and hardships of pioneer life. Of kindly impulse, the comfort of others was second only to his efforts for their business advancement; his influence is yet manifest upon men now prosperous, who attribute their success to his timely advice and assistance. During his business career he was highly esteemed by all who knew him, and especially by his employes and those who had dealings with him. Advantage was never taken of necessity, and he was lenient in the extreme to his debtors, often to his own injury.

In October, 1829, Mr. Chapin was united in marriage at Rochester, N. Y., with Miss Chloe Sloan, daughter of James and Phœbe (Stratton) Sloan. She was born May 1, 1802, at Newport, Herkimer Co., N. Y., and removed with her parents to Jefferson county, and settled near Evan's Mills. She received her education in schools at Moravia and Skaneateles, N. Y., and taught school several years. She was a woman of rare uprightness of heart and life. The members of her own family and her intimate friends knew how true and steadfast were her affections and how untiring her efforts for those she loved. She was a communicant of St. Andrews (Episcopal) Church about forty years: her husband was also a member, being one of the vestry for many years. They together did much to sustain the Church in its days of weakness and discouragement. Of four children two only are living, Charles A. Chapin, of Ann Arbor, and Mrs. S. S. Walker, of St. Johns, Mich. Another son, Volney, died in 1872, at the age of 38 years. Mr. Chapin died March 13, 1869, at the age of 66 years. Mrs. Chapin died January 15, 1876, in her 74th year.

In politics Mr. Chapin was originally a Whig, with strong Anti-Slavery sympathies. He cordially endorsed the principles of the Republican party. In 1839 and '40 he was Treasurer of the county, and was at one time President of the village.

When the First Nat. Bank was organized in 1863 he was its first President. In 1860-'64 he was Treasurer of the University of Michigan. He never solicited public office or neglected his business for any political preferment. He was a liberal contributor to Church and school interest. With all his business cares and relations he found time for reading and improving his store of useful knowledge. He was a man of correct habits, his character and reputation being above reproach.

CHAPTER XII.

EDUCATIONAL.

Education was one of the first objects that the founders of our Republic had in view. An ordinance of Congress in 1785 sequestered section 16 of each township in the "Western Territory for the support of public schools." Another ordinance of 1787, for the government of the Northwestern Territory, declared that "schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged." An act in 1804, providing for the sale of public lands in the Indiana Territory, comprising the present States of Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin, expressly reserved from sale section 16 in each township "for the support of schools." In 1805 the Territory of Michigan, comprising the lower peninsula, was organized, and in that act, all the rights secured by the previous acts and ordinances were confirmed. In 1828 Congress placed the school lands in the control of the Territorial Governor and Council.

The ordinance of 1836, by which Michigan was admitted to the Union, stipulated that section 16 in each township should be given to the State "for the use of schools."

All these acts show the unwavering purpose of the "fathers" to provide for the education of the people. The State Constitution of 1835 declared that the proceeds of all land granted by Congress for the support of schools should "remain a perpetual fund for that object."

In all the acts and ordinances referring to the grant of section 16, it was for "schools," or "public schools." By common consent from the first, this is construed to mean common, or primary schools; and it is understood that no portion of the avails of that section can ever be used for any other purpose. In some States previously admitted to the Union, the 16th section had been granted to the several townships, and the natural result was that much of the avails were lost or squandered; but through the influence of Gen. Isaac E. Crary, in the case of Michigan, it was given to the State, whereby the avails became a common fund which has ever been carefully protected by the State. At an early day the policy was adopted, of loaning the funds to counties and individuals. Nothing was ever lost in the loan to counties. The practice of loaning to individuals was soon abandoned, and yet, of such loans, about $12,000 was lost. Mortgages were taken in each case, but for some reason they were never foreclosed, and stand to this day uncanceled on the records. One mortgage was foreclosed and bid in for the State, but the State never took possession. One of these mortgages was cancelled by a resolution of the Legislature in 1877. In 1847 the Legislature directed the Board of Auditors on land claims to collect or compromise these debts, but the only surviving member of that Board has no recollection of the subject ever being considered by them.

Under the present constitution these funds are made a permanent loan to the State, and used in payment of the State debts, the State paying annual interest at seven per cent. The fund amounted Sept. 30, 1878, to $2,890,090.73. The school lands were originally estimated at 1,148,160 acres; but the Auditor General in 1874 reported the amount as 1,067,393 acres. Over 400,000 acres of this is in the upper peninsula.

The first Territorial school law was in 1827, when Gen. Cass was Governor. That enacted that the citizens of any township having fifty householders, should provide themselves with a "schoolmaster of good morals," to teach the children to read and write. Any township with 200 householders must have a schoolmaster who could teach Latin, French and English. Six years later, this law was repealed and another enacted, providing for three commissioners and 19 inspectors. This act also created an office of "Superintendent of Common Schools." There are no records showing that this office was ever filled.

Very little was actually done in the way of public schools previous to the State organization. The first State constitution provided for a Superintendent of Public Instruction. Under this law Rev. John D. Pierce, who at present resides at Ypsilanti, was appointed Superintendent in 1836, and was the first State Superintendent in the Union. Most of the States have since followed the example of Michigan in having a special head to their educational institutions.

In accordance with a vote of the Legislature, Mr. Pierce reported to that body in January, 1837, a code of school laws, which was adopted with but little change. That code consisted of 46 sections. The leading provisions were: The townships were to be divided into districts with appropriate powers. All male tax-payers, and no others, could vote in school meeting. Districts could vote a tax for buildings, not to exceed $500 in any one year, and what might be necessary for incidental expenses, not to exceed $90, for supporting the school, which must not be less than three months. Districts could vote $10 a year for a library, and those having a library shared in the proceeds from fines. No provision was made in the original law for a rate-bill, and all taxes voted by the district were assessed and collected by the assessor; but the supervisors were required to assess a tax equal to the amount of primary school fund apportioned to each district. The director hired the teacher, but must have the consent of the moderator or assessor. If the teacher's wages exceeded the funds, the Board could assess a tax to meet the deficiency, not to exceed the $90 above mentioned.

Previous to 1869, the law had not defined who had a right to attend school; and the Department of Public Instruction held that no person who was a proper subject for education could be excluded; but this was sometimes disputed. The board in a certain district refused to admit a colored child. The father sued the officers, and the case was carried by him to the Supreme Court. It was an ugly question, and under the large powers of district Boards, and the silence of the statute upon the subject, the decision would probably have been against the father. But the Legislature forestalled the necessity of a decision by enacting in 1869, that "All persons, residents of any school district, and five years of age, shall have an equal right to attend any school therein." In one city the attempt was made to establish a "colored school," and in 1871 the following was added to the law: "And no separate school or department shall be kept for any persons on account of race or color."

The powers of district Boards have been considerably enlarged, as also the minimum length of school. Instead of three months, districts with less than 30 children must now have three months, those with more than 30 must have five months, and those with over 80 must have nine months (and all as much more as the district may vote), under the penalty of forfeiture of the two-mill tax and primary-school money; and the power to decide the taxes necessary to carry on the school is taken from the district and given to the board. Districts may unite as they may be disposed, and have as many school-houses and sites as they please. All school taxes are assessed by the township supervisor, and collected like other taxes. The peculiar care of the State for the schools is shown in the fact that, out of all the taxes collected in the township, all school-taxes assessed—without reference to the amount collected—shall be paid before any moneys can be paid for any other purpose, except for township expenses. It sometimes happens that these two objects absorb all the taxes collected in the township, leaving nothing for the county or State.

The Township Board of School Inspectors now consists of the township clerk, one elected inspector, and a township superintendent of schools. The superintendent examines teachers and grants certificates, and visits the schools; and the inspectors are now limited to little more than the organization of districts and compiling of district reports.

Each township is required to support township or district libraries. The township may vote taxes for town libraries, and the districts for district libraries; but public enthusiasm on the subject is unfortunately low, and the library system is not flourishing, except in a few counties which have a large library fund from penal fines.

In the histories of the various villages, towns and cities of the counties, as full records of the various schools are given as could be obtained, or as space in the work would permit; therefore it is unnecessary to say more in this connection. The attention of the reader is called to the following table, as showing the status of the public schools in the county at the close of the school year of 1879-80:

Before the organization of the public school system, "select schools" were taught in various places throughout the county. One among the first was the select school of T. W. & Moses Merrill at Ann Arbor. Their school was opened in the fall 1829. The following was their advertisement which appeared in the first number of the Western Emigrant:

SELECT SCHOOL FOR YOUNG GENTLEMEN AND LADIES IN ANN ARBOR VILLAGE.

Branches of study.—Reading, Spelling, Mental Arithmetic, Modern Geography and English Grammar, at $2.50 per quarter:—including Writing, Practical Arithmetic, Ancient Geography, History, Philosophy, Chemistry, Logic, Astronomy, the Higher Branches of Mathematics, Composition and Declamation at $3:—including the Latin and Greek Languages, $4.50.

The instructors pledge themselves to take a lively interest in their pupils' advancement in knowledge, in good habits and amiable deportment; and by a general superintendence regarding the intellectual, physical and moral welfare of those committed to their care, while at their boarding houses as well as at their school-room, they hope to merit, as well as to receive, the patronage of parents and guardians. Boarding may be obtained at $1.00 per week. Select school books may be obtained at the school depository at the lowest prices. The first quarter will commence on Monday, November 23, 1829.

T. W. MERRILL, A. M.,

Late instructor in the Academical and Theological Institute, New Hampton, New Hampshire.

MOSES MERRILL,

Late teacher in a select school, Albany, New York.

N. B.—Preparatory scholars in reading and spelling will be admitted at $2.00.

From the foregoing it will be seen that the higher branches were to form the most prominent part of the instruction in the school of T. W. & Moses Merrill. It must be remembered this was in 1829, two years after the organization of the county, and seven years before Michigan was admitted as a State, thus showing the interest then taken in higher education, which interest has always been maintained. High schools, seminaries and academies have ever flourished, and in every thing pertaining to a liberal education Washtenaw county has taken an advanced position.

THE UNIVERSITY OF MICHIGAN.

BY PROF. CHARLES K. ADAMS.

The relations of the University to the other parts of the educational system of the State were established at a very early date. In 1817, some 20 years before Michigan became a State, the governor and judges, to whom the interests of higher education were committed by the Territorial government, drew up and adopted a very elaborate scheme for the organization of a university. The law in accordance with which this scheme was elaborated, not only made the University a part of the school system of the State, but it also provided for the ample support of the University by an extraordinary addition of no less than 15 per cent. to all existing taxation.

In 1821 some of the provisions of this act were abrogated; others were elaborated and defined. The policy of the University in matters of religion, for example, was determined to be identical with that of the common schools. The act declared that "persons of every religious denomination were capable of being elected trustees, and no person, president, professor, instructor or pupil was to be refused admittance for his conscientious persuasion in matters of religion." It provided further, that the trustees of the University "might from time to time establish such colleges, academies and schools dependent upon the University as they might think proper." It made it the duty of the trustees "to inspect such colleges, academies and schools, to examine into the state and system of education and discipline therein, and make a yearly report;" "to ordain rules for the government of the institution not inconsistent with the laws of the United States or of the Territory;" and finally it authorized them to appoint a president and professors, and to remove them at pleasure.

Thus, as early as 1821, the University was placed at the head of the educational system of the State, with comprehensive powers and great responsibilities. The fact is chiefly important as showing the manner in which the rank and position of a university was regarded during the Territorial period. It was not until Michigan became a State, in 1836, that these ideas began to assume a concrete form.

Among the first acts of the new State government was the appointment of a Superintendent of Public Instruction. The Rev. John D. Pierce was called to this office in 1836; and to him was entrusted the responsible work of preparing a system for common schools, and a plan for a university.

Mr. Pierce was a man of liberal culture. He had become especially interested in the Prussian system of education through the celebrated "Report" of Cousin. It was doubtless in consequence of his known familiarity with the best systems of education in Europe that Mr. Pierce was placed in this responsible position. But whatever the reason may have been, his first report clearly demonstrates the wisdom of his appointment.

After discussing at length the lower and intermediate schools, the Superintendent argued with especial ability and fullness that the University ought to be organized upon the broadest basis. He recommended the ultimate establishment of three departments,—one of Literature, Science and the Arts, one of Medicine, and one of Law. He discussed at length the relations of the institution to the different religious denominations of the State; and he recommended that liberal policy in the appointment of professors which has since been so successfully carried out. Not only were his recommendations marked by a broad and comprehensive wisdom, but his faith in the future of the University must have been most cheering to his associates. "In respect to the assertion," said he, "that State institutions do not and cannot flourish, it may be safely affirmed that the history of the past proves directly the reverse. The oldest and most venerable institutions in our land are emphatically State institutions; they were planted, came up, increased in stature, and attained to the maturity and vigor of manhood under the guidance and patronage of the State. The same is true of nearly all the European universities; they are State institutions, founded, sustained and directed by the State."

The recommendations of this report were adopted and became the basis on which the superstructure of the University has been erected.

The next important step in the history of the University was an effort to emancipate it from the direct control of the Legislature.

Calvin Moore

This effort was not completely successful, but it was so nearly so, that the Board of Regents became practically independent. In 1840 a committee appointed to inquire into the condition of the University, reported the changes which, in their opinion, were necessary to ensure its full and permanent success. Among other changes they recommended with great earnestness a transfer of all authority over the institution from the Legislature to the Board of Regents. This recommendation they enforced by means of a full exposition of the work to be done, as well as of the difficulty of getting it done by men chosen for the purpose of general legislation. "State institutions," declares the report, "have fallen into the hands of the several Legislatures,—fluctuating bodies, chosen with reference to their qualifications for other duties than cherishing literary institutions. When legislatures have legislated directly for colleges, their measures have been as fluctuating as the changing materials of which they are composed. When they have acted through a Board of trustees, under the show of giving representation to all, they have appointed men of such discordant and dissimilar views that they never could act in concert, so that while supposed to act for and represent somebody, they, in fact, have not and could not act for anybody. * * * What the Legislature should attempt in reference to the University is, in the opinion of the committee, to put the whole subject into the hands of competent men, leaving it with undivided responsibility on their shoulders, and then the Legislature not meddle with it again, except to protect it as guardians, not to destroy it as capricious despots. Repeated legislative interference, known by experience to be the ruin of a cause like this, would soon dishearten every Regent who takes an interest or active part in the duties of his office. The duties of the Regents, in their turn, will be mostly to provide the means and apparatus, and the like, and to fill the various faculties with able men, and throw the undivided responsibility of carrying on the work of education on them. A board of experienced Regents can manage the funds of the University better than any legislature; and the faculty can manage the business of education—the interior of the college—better than any Regents."

The policy thus vigorously advocated was not at once adopted. As we have above seen, the Legislature frequently interfered with the interests of the University by unwise legislation between 1840 and the time of the adoption of the new constitution in 1851. Interference, however, was not frequent. Practically the control of the institution, even during the period mentioned, was in the hands of the Board of Regents. From the first, also, the interior work of the University was entrusted exclusively to the professors. It is not too much to say that it is largely to this separation of powers, and this absence of officious interference that very much of the prosperity of the University is to be attributed.

We have already seen that the founders and early trustees of the University gave it power to establish and direct subordinate colleges and academies. In accordance with the powers thus granted, the trustees, in 1837, resolved to establish eight academies as branches of the University, in as many different parts of the State. Five of these schools were organized within a year; and not long afterward three or four others were opened. The hopes of the Regents, however, were disappointed. The schools did not flourish, partly because the funds of the University were insufficient to support them, partly because the population of the State had not yet become sufficiently numerous, and partly because the organization of the schools was defective. The branches, however, continued a feeble existence for nearly ten years. In 1846, a committee appointed to consider their condition, reported in favor of their discontinuance; and, accordingly, all support of them from the University fund was withdrawn.

But although the branches never became very conspicuous as preparatory schools, their influence must have been considerable on the welfare of the University. In a new State, if not indeed in any State, the most pressing need of a University is good secondary schools. It was this need, which, at a period before union schools were established, the branches did much to satisfy. When union schools arose their work was no longer needed, and they quietly passed out of existence.

We now approach a period of very great importance in the history of the University. In 1851 a new State constitution was adopted, and an important change was made in the organization of the Board of Regents. The modification which had been recommended, as we have above seen, in 1840, was now brought about by means of a constitutional provision. The ten or eleven years which had elapsed since the organization of the Board had been enough to convince the law-makers that a change was imperatively demanded. Under the system by which the Regents were appointed by the Governor and Senate, the Board was chiefly made up of politicians rather than of men of superior educational qualifications. The new constitution struck boldly at the root of the evil. Not only were the Regents henceforth to be elected directly by the people, but they were to possess greatly increased powers.

"The Board of Regents," declared the new constitution, "shall have general supervision of the University, and the direction and control of all expenditures from the University Interest Fund."

This important clause, it may be remarked, has been interpreted as giving to the Board exemption from the control of the Legislature; and under shelter of it, the Regents have not hesitated to disregard the authority of the Legislature whenever the interests of the University have seemed to demand such action. In this course the Board has been sustained by the Supreme Court of the State. It is probable that no one act in the dealings of the State with the University has conferred a greater benefit upon the institution than the clause above quoted. Before 1851, the University was controlled by good men, it is true, but by men who were appointed because of their political prominence rather than because of their interest in affairs of education; while since that time the Regents have been men selected solely on account of their real or supposed ability and disposition to administer wisely the interests of the University.

No sooner did the new Board of Regents enter upon their duties than the University seemed to enter upon a new career of prosperity. Good plans had been adopted and a firm foundation had been laid; but as yet the edifice had not begun to rise. Indeed, a positive decline in the number of students at the University had taken place. The first catalogue, that of 1843-'4, gives us the names of 53 students. This number was gradually increased until 1848, when the number had reached 89. Then for the next five years there was a steady and serious decline. In 1852 the number of students in the Department of Literature, Science and the Arts was only 57, a smaller number than had been present any year since 1845.

But now an important change took place. The new constitution required that the Board of Regents elect a President of the University; and this duty they wisely fulfilled by calling to the position Rev. Henry P. Tappan, D. D., of New York.

President Tappan brought to the University not only great ability and culture, but also an unusual enthusiasm in the work of higher education. He had studied the educational systems of the different European states, and had acquired a great admiration for the system of Prussia. On coming to the University, therefore, he had but to develop and amplify the policy which had been recommended, and indeed adopted, by Superintendent Pierce as early as 1837. But it should be said that up to the advent of President Tappan, that policy had lain practically dormant. Previous to 1850, when the Medical Department was inaugurated, nothing but the ordinary classical course had been opened; in a word, there was nothing about the institution, on his arrival, to remind one that the Prussian system had ever been so much as thought of, much less recommended and decided upon.

In his inaugural address, the President reviewed what had been recommended by Superintendent Pierce and others; and announced his purpose to develop the principles which they had adopted. Addressing the Board on this subject, he used these words: "I propose, then, generally, that you follow out the principles you have adopted, and perfect manfully your system of education according to those principles." The great merit, then, of President Tappan's work for the University was not so much that he advanced new doctrines and proposed new theories, as that he discovered the means of bringing into actual existence and practice what had previously been no more than ideal.

Nor must it be inferred that this was a work of small importance. The transformation wrought was real and almost immediate. This was brought about partly by means of opening new departments and strengthening old ones; and partly by the somewhat less tangible, but scarcely less important, work of creating and enlightening public opinion. This latter part of his work was unquestionably of vast importance throughout the State. Not only were numerous addresses either formally or informally delivered to the students on educational topics, but similar discourses on the relations of the University to the people were delivered in various portions of the State. Thus the nature of his utterances on educational subjects, as well as the charm of his personal presence, tended powerfully to bring the people of the State, and especially the alumni, into hearty sympathy with the institution.

The interior development of the University was at once begun. The President's policy in this regard was foreshadowed in his inaugural, and in his first report. "We see," said he, "a University faculty giving instruction in a college or gymnasium. Our first object will be to perfect this gymnasium. To this end we propose a scientific course parallel to the classical course. There will be comprised in it, besides other branches, civil engineering; astronomy with the use of an observatory; and the application of chemistry to agriculture and the industrial arts generally. The entire course will run through four years, in which the students will be distributed into four classes similarly to the classical course. Students who pursue the full scientific course we shall graduate as Bachelors of Science. In addition to this we shall allow students to pursue special courses, and give them at their departure certificates of their proficiency."

The policy thus promulgated by President Tappan differed in some important particulars from that adopted generally in the older universities. At Harvard, at Yale and elsewhere, the method pursued has been to keep the classical students separated in a measure from those prosecuting scientific studies. In accordance with this policy the Lawrence and Sheffield Schools have each a more or less complete existence independent of the college proper. In Michigan, on the other hand, the policy was adopted of keeping all the students in intimate relation with one another by admitting them as far as possible to the same classes.

This method appeared to offer two-fold advantage. In the first place it bound all the courses of study into the most harmonious relations; and, in the second, it made it possible to develop new courses by the addition of only such professors and teachers as were needed to give the requisite technical instruction. Students of all the courses, for example, were taught in the same laboratories, and by the same professors, and thus the necessity of duplicating means of instruction was in many cases obviated. On the basis of this theory the University has been developed. A scientific course, strictly parallel with the classical course, was at once opened; and a little later, the course in civil engineering was added.

In order that astronomy might be successfully taught, an observatory was needed. Largely through the personal solicitations of the President money was raised, chiefly in Detroit, to supply this deficiency. The Detroit Observatory, when ready for use, was recognized as one of the most perfectly equipped in the world, and its subsequent record has more than justified the high anticipations of its founders,

In 1856 the central portion of the Chemical Laboratory was erected; and the demand for instruction became so general that an important enlargement soon became imperatively necessary.

Nor in the midst of all this development of scientific studies was the old classical course weakened. On the contrary, it not only continued to enjoy the fostering care of the President and the Faculty, but it received an impulse in the appointment of Professors Boise and Frieze to the chairs of Greek and Latin, which to the present day has been to it a perpetual source of strength.

The Medical School, which had been established just before the appointment of President Tappan, was developed and strengthened.

Finally, the Law Department was opened, and under the inspiring influence of such instructors as Judges Campbell and Cooley, and their fellow professors, it grew in the course of a few years to be the most numerously attended law school in the country.

Another means by which the University was greatly strengthened and developed was by the policy adopted by President Tappan in the appointment of professors. From the first he maintained that officers of instruction should be selected solely on account of their ability to instruct. When he was pressed to make appointments on denominational grounds, he not only declined to do so, but maintained that such appointments were wrong in principle and highly injurious in practice. "Egregiously do they mistake," declared he, "the character and ends of this institution who imagine that because it belongs to no sect or party in particular, it therefore belongs to all sects and parties conjointly and of equal right. It not only does not belong to any sect or party in particular, it belongs to no sect or party at all. The prime object of a seminary of learning is not like that of a Church, to inculcate religion or perform its services, but afford education. A little reflection in connection with some experience of the pressure of denominational interest produced in my own mind, and, I believe, in the minds of the entire Board, a settled conviction that any regard to religious denominationalism in the appointment of professors, is both wrong in principle and productive of endless embarrassment. There is no safe guide in the appointment of professors save in the qualifications of the candidate."

On leaving the University, President Tappan again reverted to the same policy, and made this very emphatic declaration: "One thing is certain, no appointment has since been made [i. e., since his arrival at the University] with any reference to denominational connection. After Dr. Bruunow reached Ann Arbor, I for the first time asked him whether he were a Catholic or a Protestant, when he informed me that he was a Lutheran Protestant. Dr. Haven, who brought Prof. Winchell's name before the Board of Regents, affirmed that he was ignorant of his denominational connection. Prof. Frieze was known to be an Episcopalian, but was elected through the instrumentality of Prof. Boise, himself a Baptist. Dr. Ford and Prof. Wood were elected while we were entirely ignorant of their denominational connection. Messrs. Peck and Trowbridge (from West Point) were elected without any knowledge on our part of their religious predilections. Mr. White, although known to be an attendant of the Episcopal Church, was elected on the recommendation of the Congregational President and many others of the Congregational clergymen and professors at New Haven."

Accordingly, the policy announced by the President was consistently pursued to the end of his administration. It requires but the merest reference to the names of professors appointed during his administration to show that the University brought together under this policy a galaxy of unusually able men. Boise, Palmer, Winchell, Brunnow, Ford, Frieze, White, Campbell, Walker, Cooley, Wood, Watson and Armor,—such were the assistants whom President Tappan gathered around him.

Thus, by the founding of new departments, by the establishment of new professorships, and by the appointment of men of culture and skill to fill the vacant chairs, as well as by the noble utterances of the President on educational subjects, the work of the University was immensely extended in breadth and in depth. The first catalogue in which President Tappan's name occurs contains a list of 14 officers and 222 students; the last one shows that the number had increased during the 11 years of his administration to 30 officers and 652 students.

In the summer of 1863, President Tappan was succeeded by President Haven. The circumstances attending the change of administration were such as to place serious obstacles in the way of the new President. Predictions were rife that disaster to the University would ensue. These predictions, however, proved groundless. It soon became obvious that the institution was too firmly established to be dependent upon any single person. Although the University, both without and within, was violently agitated, the number of students who applied for admission in the autumn of 1863 was greater than ever before. It was evident that the institution had acquired a momentum which no temporary agitation could check.

Embarrassments of a somewhat serious nature, however, now began to be felt. During the administration of President Tappan the financial resources of the University had been adequate to its most pressing necessities. The salaries of professors in the Literary Department had been fixed at $1,500, and plans had been adopted on the supposition that these salaries would be permanent. On the outbreak of the war, however, prices advanced so rapidly that the salaries paid were no longer equal to the necessities of the position. But the income of the University was very nearly fixed

The large increase in the number of students called for a similar increase of expenditure, both for instruction and for incidentals; while the additional amount received from the small fees of this increased number was altogether inadequate to the increased demand. The University was in fact embarrassed by its prosperity.

Accordingly, in September of 1866 measures were taken by the President and the Board of Regents to bring the financial necessities of the University before the Legislature. The President and several members of the Board repaired to Lansing on the opening of the session and laid the subject before the two houses.

The result of their effort afforded no relief, although it changed the nature of the embarrassment. An act, as above mentioned, was passed, giving to the University a twentieth of a mill tax (equivalent to about $16,000 per annum); but, accompanying the grant was a condition which the Regents felt it impracticable to fulfill. The money was to be paid only on condition that at least one professor of homeopathy should be appointed in the Department of Medicine.

The excitement at the University in consequence of this act was very intense. Several resignations of professors in the Medical Department occurred, and it was understood that all the members of the Medical Faculty wrote their resignations with the determination of presenting them in case the grant should be accepted on the condition imposed.

The Medical School had become one of the most prosperous, if indeed it were not without exception the most prosperous in the country, the catalogue for that year showing an attendance of 525 students. In view of the fact that the school would obviously be broken up by an acceptance of the grant, the Regents voted to postpone the decision of the question for one year.

At the end of 12 months, a period filled with agitation of the subject, the matter was again taken in hand. An attempt was now made to comply with the conditions of the law so far as was necessary to secure the grant, and at the same time to evade them so far as was necessary to save the Medical Department. For the purpose of accomplishing these two very desirable results, the Board "resolved to organize a school in the Department of Medicine, to be called the 'Michigan School of Homeopathy,' and to be located at such place other than Ann Arbor as should pledge to the Board of Regents the greatest amount for the building and endowment of said school." For the purpose of carrying out that provision, a professor of theory and practice of homeopathic medicine was appointed, and $3,000 were appropriated to be expended in the organization of the school.

Before anything further was done, however, the matter was carried into court. It is enough, in this connection, to say that the Supreme Bench of the State declared that the course of the Regents was not a compliance with the requirements of the law.

When the Legislature met in January of 1869, the needs of the University again came up for consideration. The course of the Regents in rejecting the grant of the previous session was severely scrutinized; but in the end a majority of the legislators were brought to see that any other disposition of the matter would have imperilled one of the most prosperous departments of the University. Accordingly a new bill was passed giving to the institution the sum accumulated under the previous grant, together with a subsidy of $15,500 a year. Best of all, the grant was free from the obnoxious conditions of the previous act. In view of the turbulent animosities which agitated the practitioners and adherents of the two schools of medicine in all parts of the States, this legislation was scarcely less creditable to the conciliatory and politic wisdom of President Haven than to the sympathetic generosity of the Legislature itself.

During the six years of President Haven's administration, the different parts of the University were steadily developed. In the Department of Literature, Science and the Arts, three additional and distinct courses of study were introduced. The Latin and Scientific course was designed to afford a compromise between the strictly classical and the strictly scientific courses. In the place of Greek were substituted French and German, and in the place of a portion of the higher mathematics were given somewhat more advanced studies in English. A course in Mining Engineering was also offered, but as the appliances for technical illustration were meager, no very marked advancement could be made. The course in Pharmacy, designed for the education of apothecaries and druggists, on the contrary, attracted to it so large a number of students, that the already spacious accommodations of the Chemical Laboratory had to be considerably increased.

In 1869 President Haven withdrew from the University leaving behind him every token of a prosperous administration. Every department of the institution had been extended in breadth and in depth; and the number of students in attendance had increased to somewhat more than 1,100.

It was two years after the resignation of President Haven before President J. B. Angell was inaugurated as his successor. Meanwhile the affairs of the University were ably administered by Prof. H. S. Frieze as Acting-President.

In the course of Acting-President Frieze's term of office several measures of great importance were adopted.

The most noteworthy of these was unquestionably the opening of the University to women.

The question of the admission of women to the privileges of the institution had often been agitated. In 1858 the subject was brought before the Board of Regents by the petition of a number of young ladies asking for admission to the University. The question was carefully considered by the President and the Board. On the 8th of September of that year an elaborate and able report adverse to the petition was adopted by the Regents. The next step in the history of the movement was taken in the Legislature. In the winter of 1867 it was resolved "That it is the deliberate opinion of this Legislature that the high objects for which the University of Michigan was organized will never be fully attained until women are admitted to all its rights and privileges."

On the basis of this declaration the Board of Regents at their meeting in April, 1867, instructed the Executive Committee "to consider this subject, and at some future time report whether the regulations relating to the admission of students to the different departments of the University, and to the conferring of degrees should not be so construed as not to exclude women, residing in the State of Michigan, from the right of matriculation, and to become candidates for graduation upon the same conditions and with the same requirements as are demanded of men."

In September of the same year, while the subject was still before the committee, President Haven discussed the matter at some length in his annual report. The embarrassments that would arise in case of a compliance with the declared wish of the Legislature were fully considered. The conclusion reached by the President was expressed in the declaration that "it is too late now to make this change without a revolution that should not be risked except under a necessity that cannot otherwise be met. And if insisted upon," continued the President, "suitable appropriations of money to meet the expense should be made. The establishment of a State college for young ladies would reasonably and successfully meet the demand."

One year later, however, the President declared that his views on the question had undergone some modification. In his report of September, 1868, he expressed the belief that, as the deliberate opinion of the Legislature appeared to be the opinion of the people of the State, the University, belonging to the State, ought to regard that opinion. "The more I consider the subject," declares the report, "and the more carefully I study the results of the education of both sexes in the same schools, the more inclined am I to the belief that the best method for Michigan would be to make provision for the instruction of women at the University, on the same conditions as men. I have come to this conclusion slowly. A few objections have sometimes seemed to me strong, but the most of what is urged against it is fanciful, and partakes of the nature of the thoughtless opposition made to what is new."

In April, 1869, Regent Willard, who had from the first ardently advocated the measure, presented to the Board the following resolution:

"Resolved, That in the opinion of the Board no rule exists in any of the University statutes which excludes women from admission to the University."

The resolution was laid upon the table by a vote of five to three.

But it was becoming more and more apparent that the demands of the public could not long be resisted. The necessities of the University were becoming more and more imperative, and it seemed doubtful whether the Legislature would grant the necessary aid unless women were admitted to a share of its benefits. It is also probably true that the difficulties in the way of an admission of women seemed less formidable on a more mature consideration. Accordingly, in January of 1870, the subject was again brought before the Board of Regents by Regent Willard; and the question was finally settled by the adoption of the following resolution:

“Resolved, That the Board of Regents recognize the right of every resident of Michigan to the enjoyment of the privileges afforded by the University, and no rule exists in the University statutes for the exclusion of any person from the University who possesses the requisite literary and moral qualifications.”

From what has been given in the above statement of facts it will be seen that the resolution, though unpretending and simply expository in its nature, embodied in itself nothing less than a measure which had received the most careful attention, and which was fraught with the most far-reaching results.

The admission of women to the University made further appropriation by the Legislature imperatively necessary. It was at once determined that in the Department of Medicine women should not be taught in the same classes as men, and consequently that the lectures would have to be duplicated. This fact not only made an increase of salary to the Professors in the Medical Department necessary, but it also called for increased accommodations in the way of buildings and apparatus. Such increased facilities, moreover, were especially imperative in the Literary Department.

Accordingly, in January of 1871, the wants of the University were brought before the State Legislature. The solicitation was not in vain. Although the homeopathic question was still unsettled, and although in consequence of this fact some bitterness toward the course of the Regents was manifested, yet it was obvious that the Legislature as a whole were proud of the University, and were determined to support it. An important appropriation was made in response to the efforts of the University authorities. This was an independent grant of $75,000 for the purpose of affording increased accommodations to the Literary Department, a grant from which the building known as University Hall was chiefly erected. This legislation was important not only as affording assistance to the University, but as the inauguration of a policy which, it was hoped, would afford it permanent and adequate support.

Another measure of great importance inaugurated in the course of Professor Frieze's administration was the formation of an official connection between the University and the high schools of the State.

The University from its first organization had been regarded as in reality a portion of the school system of the commonwealth. The first Superintendent and the first President had labored to establish the connection implied by this relationship. In the Prussian system of education, which President Tappan endeavored to imitate, there is an official recognition of the gymnasia by the university in the admission of the pupils of the former to the latter without entrance examination. In Michigan, however, the different parts of the system had remained, up to this time, in comparative isolation. The graduate of a Michigan high school could claim no exemption from examination on presenting himself at the University, by reason of his diploma. This was doubtless owing to the fact that the founders of the institution had intended to place the dividing line which separated the real University from the real gymnasium within the University itself. President Tappan, it may be remarked, had always regarded the ordinary four years' course as really preparatory to post-graduate studies. The undergraduate course, in his design, was to take the relative position of the German gymnasium. But in the years that had intervened since the opening of the University no very considerable increase of post-graduate work had been brought about. An overwhelming majority of students still continued to regard their University education as complete at the moment when they received their Bachelor's degree. But in the meantime the high schools in the State had been constantly raising their standards of proficiency. Thus, as it became more and more improbable that the undergraduate course could be made to correspond with the intermediate schools of the German system, it became a question whether the high schools might not with propriety be brought to occupy that position. Under these circumstances it would be folly to keep the undergraduate course at a low standard in the hope that those who should complete it would continue their studies as post-graduates, when experience had shown that such a hope would be generally disappointed. Would it not be better to raise the undergraduate course to something really approaching a university course, and at the same time to raise the high schools into a rank analogous to the gymnasium? Nearly every consideration seemed to favor the adoption of the latter course.

In order to bring about the desired result two changes seemed to be demanded. In the first place the preparatory schools should be brought into an approximate uniformity of organization; and in the second, the collegiate course should be raised and extended as rapidly as the condition of the preparatory schools and the means at the disposal of the University would warrant. The latter of these necessary changes could easily be brought about by multiplying the number of elective studies in the University courses; the former could only be done by first establishing an official relationship between the University and the schools such as would be mutually satisfactory and beneficial. It was for the purpose of establishing such relationship that the University catalogue for 1870 published the following Special Notice to Preparatory Schools:

“Whenever the Faculty shall be satisfied that the preparatory course in any school is conducted by a sufficient number of competent instructors, and has been brought up fully to the foregoing requirements, the diploma of such schools certifying that the holder has completed the preparatory course and sustained the examination in the same, shall entitle the candidate to be admitted to the University without further examination.”

This somewhat indefinite announcement was the inauguration of a policy which has since been pursued not only in Michigan, but in several of the other States. On the introduction of the system it became obviously necessary to specify with precision the conditions on which students could avail themselves of the privileges granted. Those conditions have been somewhat modified from time to time as there has seemed to be necessity.

It is worthy of mention that it was during the administration of Prof. Frieze that the first important addition by private liberality was made to the University library. It became known that the library of the late Prof. Rau, of the University of Heidelberg, was for sale; and the Acting-President of the University at once set about securing the means of purchasing it. His efforts were successful. Philo Parsons, Esq., of Detroit, not only bought the library for the University, but also volunteered to fill out important sets of books and periodicals as yet incomplete. Thus the University library was enriched by an addition of about 4,000 volumes and 5,000 pamphlets devoted to the science of government, political economy and cognate subjects.

Soon after the resignation of Dr. Haven, Dr. J. B. Angell, of the University of Vermont, was invited to the vacant presidency. This invitation he declined. Nearly two years later, however, it was renewed and accepted. In June, 1871, therefore, President Angell was inaugurated, and in the following September he entered upon the duties of his office.

From what has been noted it will be observed that President Angell entered upon his executive duties just after several very important innovations had been determined upon. The admission of women to all the departments of the University, and the admission of students from the high school of the State to the Literary Department without examination were changes of too great moment to be entered upon without considerable solicitude.

Several American colleges had adopted co-education; but with these the system had grown up from the beginning. In no instance had an institution thrown out eminent success on the old system, and then deliberately thrown open its doors to both sexes. But here was an army of 1,200 young men already in possession of the field; and it is not strange that the resolution to offer all the privileges of the University to women as well as to men was adopted with no little anxiety.

Even the most ardent friends of co-education were not without solicitude. As early as 1858, when the subject first came before the Board for serious consideration, the opinions of the most prominent educators in the land had been obtained. In a very elaborate report on the subject submitted on the 29th of September of that year, these opinions were presented somewhat at length. A majority of the educators consulted were manifestly adverse to the adoption of the proposed measure. But even those who on general principles favored joint-education seemed to think that it could be recommended only when surrounded by conditions such as the University of Michigan could not afford. President Mann, of Antioch College, wrote that while in his opinion the advantages of co-education were great, the dangers of it were terrible, and it ought not to be adopted in the University of Michigan unless ample provisions could be made for the exclusion of those dangers. President Finney, of Oberlin, wrote in terms scarcely less decided. Under favorable circumstances he approved heartily of joint education. But in his opinion it ought to be surrounded by numerous safeguards.

It was in the face of these somewhat dismal premonitions that the University deliberately incorporated upon itself the more comprehensive plan. Young men were not lodged in dormitories; and no dormitories were provided for young ladies. No matron with a corps of lady assistants was appointed to keep up a supervision. In the Department of Medicine, indeed, provision was made for separate instruction to women; but with this exception no new classes were formed. The class room, the libraries, the museums were simply thrown open to the women on precisely the same conditions as to the men. In short, the University undertook no further responsibility than that of giving instruction to both sexes in the same classes and under the same conditions.

It may be too soon to speak with absolute assurance of the success of the experiment; but so far as the experience of 10 years goes to settle the question, it all tends to show that the fears and anxieties of the opponents of the movement were not well founded. For a number of weeks but one solitary lady chose to avail herself of the advantages held out by the new resolution; but the number has increased until, according to returns, in 1880 there are in attendance 138. It is important to note that no one of the numerous evils predicted has made its appearance. Every careful observer will probably admit that neither the scholarship nor the morality of the University has suffered from this important innovation. Concerning the health of the ladies Professor Tyler, in a recent article in "Scribner's Monthly" used the following language: "The physical disasters to the women themselves, which an eminent medical authority has of late clearly demonstrated to be the penal consequences of feminine toil at the dry and arduous tasks of University study, have thus far strangely failed to make their appearance in this neighborhood. Indeed, the ladies here seem to thrive ludicrously well under the rugged regimen to which they have been put; and their omission to verify the predictions of an a priori alarm is something bordering upon the cruel."

During the administration of President Angell, the work of the Senior year of students in the Department of Literature, Science, and the Arts, has become far more attractive. With the single exception of logic and psychology, in the first semester, all the studies of the year have been made elective. Each student is required to take at least three studies, but he is at liberty to select from the long list presented in the calendar. The result of this change was in the highest degree satisfactory to both students and professors. Courses were selected which accord with individual tastes and aptitudes; and, consequently, the work of the Senior year was prosecuted with an enthusiasm previously quite unknown.

It was largely in consequence of the success of this experiment that in 1877 the Faculty decided to extend the privileges of election of studies still further. After mature deliberation they decided to open the whole course to an elective system, subject only to such restrictions as might be absolutely essential. Since that date students have been allowed to select such studies as they choose, the only limitation of absolute freedom being the necessity of taking certain prescribed studies at some time in their course before presenting themselves for a degree.

The influence of this bold action has undoubtedly been wholesome. This has shown itself in the additional zeal with which the students have carried on their work, and in a manifest decrease of discontent and disorder.

As above intimated, the admission of women made it imperatively necessary that the income of the University should be increased. Representations of this fact made to the Legislature in the session of 1873, were successful in securing an additional grant. The act of 1869, giving to the University $15,500 a year, was repealed, and an act was substituted in its place, authorizing a twentieth of a mill tax. This change gave to the University an additional income of about $15,000 a year.

A special appropriation was also made for the establishment and support of a school of mines in the Department of Literature, Science, and the Arts. This provision, however, was cut off by the Legislature in 1877. Another grant provided for a School of Dentistry. Besides these generous provisions, amounting in all to $19,500 a year, the Legislature further granted $8,000 for the establishment of a State hospital, on condition that the citizens of Ann Arbor would add $4,000 to the sum; $5,000 to procure a supply of water for the University grounds; and $13,000 to pay outstanding warrants issued by the University, chiefly for the extension of the Chemical Laboratory. These appropriations amounted in the aggregate to scarcely less than what would be derived from an endowment of $300,000. The Legislature of 1879 made appropriations for meeting the most pressing wants of the University. The most important of these were $40,000 for a new museum building, $20,000 for a boiler house, and sufficient sums for the erection of a clinical amphitheater in connection with each of the medical hospitals.

Whatever may be thought of the early policy of the Legislature toward the University, the liberality manifested since 1869 affords most gratifying evidence that the State is disposed to bestow upon the institution all needed support.

These appropriations have enabled the University authorities to enlarge and multiply the courses of study. A brief notice of the most important of these courses will indicate the extent of the development which has taken place.

The classical course does not differ in any essential particular from similar courses in the older colleges at the East. It is perhaps only necessary to say in this connection that under the wise and scholarly guidance of Professors Boise and Frieze, the classical course was so firmly established that no multiplication of other departments of study has shaken its pre-eminence. In every class up to the present time, the classical students have outnumbered all others.

The scientific course extends also over four years. It is designed, not only to afford more ample facilities for the study of the various sciences, but also to give a more thorough training in the modern languages.

The Latin and scientific course differs chiefly from the classical in the substitution of French and German in the place of Greek.

A course in civil engineering extends through four years, and is designed to lay a foundation for the successful practice of the profession. The conditions for admission to this course are the same as those for admission to the course in science.

The School of Pharmacy provides for a two years' course of study in the various branches of chemical analysis. Besides the requisite recitations and lectures, the experimental and practical work in the Laboratory requires about four hours of daily application throughout the whole of two years.

In that admirable report on the organization of the University, presented by President Pierce as early as 1837, the author recommended the establishment of schools of medicine and law, at the earliest practicable moment. But, notwithstanding this recommendation and the adoption of this report, it was not until 1849 that the Board found itself in condition to organize even the first of the professional schools. The catalogue for 1848-'9 announced that arrangements were being made to commence a course of instruction in medicine in the autumn term of that year. It was further announced that the Board of Regents had adopted the plan of requiring attendance upon but one course of lectures, which, in consequence, would be extended through the academic year. It was not, however, until the autumn of 1850 that the first course of lectures was given. A change in the plan of instruction, moreover, had been adopted before the college was formally opened.

The University catalogue for the year 1850-'1, the first which contained a list of medical students, shows that the school was organized on the same basis on which it continued to rest until the year 1879. Each candidate for admission was required to furnish evidence of good moral character, and, if a candidate for graduation, also of such literary attainments as had been recommended by the National Medical Association, viz.: "A good English education, the knowledge of Natural Philosophy, the Elementary Mathematical Sciences, and such an acquaintance with the Latin and Greek languages as will enable the student to appreciate the technical language of medicine, and read and write prescriptions." To be admitted to the degree of Doctor of Medicine, the student was required to have studied medicine and surgery for a term of three years, to have attended two full courses of lectures, and to be at least 21 years of age, and, of course, to have passed all the required examinations. The annual course of lectures in this department began upon the first Wednesday of October, and continued until the third Wednesday of April. The first catalogue of the department contains the names of Professors Sager, Douglas, Gunn, Denton and Allen, besides the names of as many as 95 students.

It is interesting to read in the same catalogue the following hopeful statement in regard to the condition of the college: "Notwithstanding the unusual duration of the medical term, and the uncertainty attendant upon the success of a new medical college, it is a source of gratification to all interested in the welfare of this institution, to observe the remarkable prosperity which has thus far attended it. It is believed that the present class, already large, almost beyond precedent in the history of medical colleges, will be still further augmented in number, at the next session."

The prediction contained in this last sentence was amply fulfilled; for the catalogue of 1851-'2 gives the number of students of medicine as 159. The remarkable success of the Medical School, as indicated by these figures, appears the more striking in view of the fact that the whole number of students in the Department of Literature, Science, and the Arts, for the same year, was only 57. It is obvious that the various influences which had steadily reduced the number of students in the Literary Department for a number of years previous to 1852, were not felt in the Department of Medicine.

Nor did the Medical School at once attain to the full measure of its growth. The catalogues of the University show that the remarkable prosperity which attended the opening of this department was no mere spasmodic success, followed by a relapse into secondary importance; on the contrary, the number of students increased steadily, and indeed rapidly, until in 1866 the class numbered no less than 525. This very large number, however, was owing to an exceptional cause. At the close of the civil war a large number of soldiers entered at once upon the studies of a professional education. But the most important step in advance taken by the Medical College was that announced in 1878, and fully entered upon in 1880. Not only was the term lengthened from six months to nine, but the conditions of the degree were made to depend upon an attendance on lectures, of three years.

The policy of the University in regard to buildings has generally allowed the demand to anticipate the supply. The Board of Regents have never made the mistake of believing that ample and showy accommodations would attract large numbers of students. It may be said, that from the first no building has been erected until the necessity of its existence has become really pressing. If there has been any exception to this policy, it was perhaps in the erection of the first building for the accommodation of the Department of Medicine. It was erected some three years before the department was opened, and was the result of a somewhat curious circumstance.

In 1845 the Board of Regents determined to erect for the Literary Department a second dormitory building, which should be an exact duplicate of that completed in 1841. Dr. Douglas, who had recently entered upon the duties of his professorship of chemistry and geology, was employed by the Board to superintend the construction of the new building. As the new structure was to correspond in every particular with the one previously erected, the bills of the former one were duplicated in ordering materials for the latter. On the completion of the second building, however, it was found that a large amount of materials remained unused. It was in view of this unexpected and gratifying fact that the Regents authorized Prof. Douglas to begin the work of erecting a building for a chemical laboratory. The records of the Board show that the various appropriations made for building purposes at this period, were for a Laboratory, although the building erected with the money appropriated was what has since been known as the Old Medical College. The lower story of the new edifice was occupied as a chemical laboratory some two or three years before the opening of the Medical Department in 1850.

The accommodations thus provided, partially in anticipation of the School of Medicine, continued to be sufficient until 1855, when it was found necessary to begin the erection of the present laboratory for the use of students in chemistry. Again, on the outbreak of the civil war, the number of medical students increased greatly; hence it was necessary to enlarge the Medical College. No special appropriation from the Legislature was called for; but the citizens of Ann Arbor generously contributed $10,000 for the purpose of aiding the Regents in carrying out their design. Two large lecture-rooms, with adjacent offices, were provided for at an expense of $20,315. The new building was ready for occupation in the autumn of 1864. It is gratifying to note that the first class which assembled in the completed structure numbered nearly 500.

The next important event in the history of the School of Medicine was the admission of women. When it was finally determined to throw open the privileges of the University to both sexes, it became an important question whether, in the Medical Department, women should be admitted to the classes already formed; or whether they should receive instruction in a class by themselves. The latter course was immediately determined upon. A new lecture room was provided for, and nearly all the lectures were repeated before the class of ladies. In cases of clinical instruction, it was at the option of the Faculty whether the clinic should be in the presence of both sexes or whether it should be in the presence of either of the sexes alone. During the past three or four years, the number of women in attendance each year has been about 60.

The advantages afforded for clinical instruction in the Medical School have been as great as possible in a city no larger than Ann Arbor. Several years since, the number of applicants for treatment was already so considerable that the erection of a hospital became an imperative necessity. One of the University houses was therefore devoted to this purpose. This was soon found, however, to afford altogether inadequate accommodations; and, accordingly, application was made to the Legislature for an appropriation with which to erect a State Hospital in connection with the Medical Department of the University. The application was not at once successful, but favorable action was not very long delayed. The Legislature of 1875 granted $8,000 for the erection and equipment of a hospital, on the condition that the city of Ann Arbor would grant $4,000 for the same purpose. The condition was immediately fulfilled, and the buildings have accordingly been erected. Two pavilions, each 115 feet long by 28 feet wide, with 17 feet ceiling, were attached to the former hospital building. The latter is to be hereafter devoted exclusively to administrative purposes. The new buildings have been amply provided with every appointment of a first-class hospital, such as baths, water-closets, heating and ventilating apparatus as well as sitting and reception rooms for patients and visitors. Several private rooms have also been provided for such patients as may desire to pay an increased price for better accommodations than those afforded by the general wards. All medical attendance is gratuitous; the only fees required being for board and medicine, at their actual cost. No contagious diseases are admitted; but patients are received from any part of the country. It is believed that the amount of clinical material will hereafter be as great as can be profitably used in the course of instruction.

One of the most embarrassing questions in the history of the University has been the subject of homeopathic medicine. The Legislature of the State early required the Regents to appoint at least one professor of homeopathy in the Medical Department. But the Regents declined to comply with this requirement, alleging as a reason for their action, that a compliance would injure, if not indeed destroy, one of the most flourishing departments of the University. At two different periods a mandamus was issued to compel the Board of Regents to carry out the Legislative requirement. But the Supreme Court held that the powers of the Regents were received from the constitution of the State, and therefore could not be interfered with by the Legislature.

Accordingly, after this puzzling question had agitated the State and perplexed the Regents during much of the time for 20 years, the Legislature of 1875 provided for the establishment of a Homeopathic Medical College as a separate department of the University.

It remains only to be said that the Regents at once adopted measures for carrying out the provisions of this act. A building was fitted up for the use of the Homeopathic Medical College; and two professors, one of Theory and Practice of Homeopathic Medicine and one of Materia Medica and Therapeutics, were appointed. It was determined that the conditions of admission should be the same as those formerly exacted of all medical students. To gain instruction in General Chemistry, Anatomy, Organic and Applied Chemistry, Physiology, Ophthalmology, Otology and Practical Anatomy, Surgery, Obstetrics and Diseases of Women and Children, students are required to attend the lectures on those subjects in the "Department of Medicine and Surgery." Each professor whose instruction the student is required to attend furnishes a certificate to that effect whenever such student has passed the necessary examinations; and the certificates thus given are laid before the Board of Regents, who award the degrees, and sign the diplomas. The School of Homeopathic Medicine, organized on this basis, was opened for the work of instruction on the first of October, 1875, with 22 students in attendance. In 1879 the Legislature made still further appropriations for the Homeopathic Department. The hospital and clinical privileges were extended so that the opportunities of students should be equal to those enjoyed by students of the old Department of Medicine and Surgery.

This disposition of an important and troublesome question was generally accepted by the Regents and the several faculties of the University as offering fewer embarrassments than any other that had ever been proposed. Whether it will in the end be equally satisfactory to the members of the medical profession, it is, perhaps, too soon to predict with any confidence.

Although from the earliest history of the University, the establishment of a Department of Law had been contemplated, it was not until the December meeting of the Regents in 1858, that this purpose took definite form. At that time a committee of three was appointed to consider and report a plan for the establishment of a Law Department in the University. At a meeting held March 29, 1859, Regent Johnson, in behalf of this committee, recommended the establishment and the immediate organization of such a department. The report of the committee was adopted; and Messrs J. V. Campbell, C. I. Walker and T. M. Cooley were appointed Law Professors in the University, their time of service to commence on the first day of the following October. Provision was also made at the same meeting for the opening of the department, and the delivery of the first course of lectures in the following autumn.

In October of the same year a committee was appointed to devise means for the erection of a suitable building for the use of the department. It was not, however, until March, 1861, that the Board saw its way to the accomplishment of this purpose. After the plans of different architects had been considered, and that of Messrs. Jordan & Anderson, of Detroit, had been adopted, a building committee was appointed and authorized to make the most favorable contract possible for the completion of the building before September 20, 1862. The building was not ready for occupation, however, until the autumn of 1863. This delay was doubtless owing in part to the fact that the original purpose had undergone considerable modification. It was finally determined by the Board to erect a building large enough not only to accommodate the Law Department, but also to serve temporarily the purposes of a general library room and a chapel. The library was at once removed to its new quarters; and it continues still to occupy almost the entire lower story of the building, much to the inconvenience of the Law Department. On the erection of the University Hall in 1873, the law building was no longer needed for a chapel, ample accommodations having been provided for in the new edifice. It is to be hoped that at no distant day similar provisions may be made for the general library.

It may also be said that from the domestication of the Law Department in its new quarters in 1863, it has had no history. In 1866 a fourth professorship was created; and Ashley Pond, Esquire, of Detroit, was appointed Fletcher Professor of Law. Two years later Prof. Pond was succeeded by Prof. Charles A. Kent, who still occupies the chair to which he was then appointed. The only other change that has taken place in the Faculty of this department was in the appointment of Mr. William P. Wells as Lecturer, to discharge the duties of Prof. Walker, who at his own urgent request was excused from service for two years. On the resignation of Prof. Walker in 1877, Mr. Wells was appointed Professor.

In 1878, the Faculty was still further enlarged by the appointment of ex-Governor Alpheus Felch as Tappan Professor of Law. From first to last no essential differences of opinion have arisen in regard to the policy and workings of the department. The first class of students numbered 90; in 1863, only seven years from the establishment of the school, the number in attendance was as high as 385. Since that time the attendance in any one year has never descended so low as 300; in 1879-'80, the number was 395.

The last of the professional schools established in the University is the School of Dentistry. This department was provided for by a Legislative act in 1875. In accordance with the requirements of that act the school was at once organized by the Regents, and was opened for students in the autumn of 1875. Two professors and a demonstrator were appointed, and the school was commodiously accommodated in one of the University buildings formerly occupied as a dwelling. In the basement of the building furnaces were erected for the manipulation and management of the precious metals with reference to their application to dental purposes; and in the rooms above all the requisite facilities were furnished for the most thorough course in didactic and clinical instruction. Students of dentistry have all the privileges afforded by the Chemical Laboratory, as well as the advantages of the lectures on Anatomy, Physiology and Surgery in the Department of Medicine. Candidates for graduation must have devoted three years to the study of the profession, in connection with attendance upon a full course of medical lectures, and must have attended two full courses of lectures in a dental college, one of which, at least, must have been in the University of Michigan. The facilities afforded by the school for the study of dentistry are believed to be unsurpassed. The number of students in the class of 1875, the first year in the history of the department, was 20. The number in '79-'80 was 83.

Among the most important means of education in any institution of learning are to be considered the libraries.

The nucleus of the general library of the University of Michigan was a collection of about 3,700 volumes purchased in 1840. The books were selected in Europe by Dr. Asa Gray, then Professor of Botany and Zoölogy in the University. Unfortunately, the money at the disposal of the Regents admitted of but few additions to this small number of volumes in the course of the next ten years.

On the arrival of President Tappan, however, attention was called to the meagre condition of the library; and in accordance with his recommendation regular appropriations were made for its increase. In 1856 Mr. John Tappan, son of the President, was appointed Librarian; and in the course of the same year the library was removed from its crowded quarters in one of the small rooms of the South College, to the ample accommodations then afforded by the lower story of the Museum.

It was not, however, until after the increasing demands for space in the North College had driven the library to its present quarters in the Law Building, that its educational power was fully developed. This transfer took place in 1863. In the following year the Rev. Andrew Ten Brook was appointed Librarian, an office which he continued to hold until 1877, when he was succeeded by Mr. Raymond C. Davis, formerly an Assistant Librarian in the same library.

Two important changes were introduced during the administration of Mr. Ten Brook, in order to make the library more completely accessible to students. In the first place the room was opened for use in the evening as well as in the day time. Of still greater importance was the preparation of a card catalogue on what is known as the Harvard plan. It consists of two parts, one comprising a list of the names of authors alphabetically arranged, together with the titles of such of their works as may be in the library; the other an index of subjects and a reference to all the works in the library which treat of the subjects named. This latter branch of the catalogue is so comprehensive as to include not only the volumes treating of special subjects, but also all the articles of importance in the reviews and magazines. The catalogue consists of nearly 100,000 cards, so arranged as to be consulted by the student with the greatest ease. The library is regularly open for the use of students from 9 A. M. to 5 P. M., and again from 7 to 9:30 P. M., except during vacations, when it is usually closed in the evening.

The general library contains at the present time about 27,000 volumes, besides somewhat more than 7,000 pamphlets. In addition to these should be mentioned some 95 American and European periodicals kept regularly on file. The amount appropriated for the general library by the Board of Regents varies from year to year from $1,500 to $3,000. As this amount has to cover the purchases of books as well as of periodicals it falls far short of the demands of the various departments of study. These demands are rapidly increasing. It is confidently believed that no other university library in the country is more used by students than is our own. The number of works drawn by students alone, according to the most recent statistics, extending through a week of no unusual literary activity, averages as high as 278 per day. On Saturdays the number reaches usually as high as 350, exclusive of papers and periodicals furnished to the reading-room by students themselves.

From these statistics, which evince an extraordinary interest in the library, it will be justly inferred that the additions made from year to year by the Regents are altogether inadequate to the demands made upon it. The library has indeed been selected with unusual care. But there is a pressing necessity that it be speedily increased. Perhaps no other want of the University is so imperative; certainly no other one appeals more invitingly to private munificence.

Besides the general library, which is open for the use of all the departments, the professional schools have libraries of a more specific and technical nature. The Law Library contains about 3,500 volumes and is open to students about 10 hours daily. That of the Medical Department contains about 1,500 volumes, besides the files of 22 medical journals. The Literary Societies connected with the Department of Literature, Science, and the Arts—two in number—have collected libraries of about 3,000 volumes. The Christian Association has also a library of well selected works numbering about 1,000 volumes.

In the aggregate, the number of volumes accessible to students in the various libraries of the University is about 36,000.

As early as 1837, the Board of Trustees of the University appointed a committee to consider and report upon the best methods of procuring a library and a cabinet of natural history. In the following year the committee reported, and advised the Board that the Baron Lederer collection of minerals, consisting of about 2,600 very choice specimens, could be procured for $4,000. The Board appropriated the money, and the purchase was made. This collection was the beginning of the present general Museum.

In the course of the same year provision was made by the Legislature for depositing in the University the specimens that might be collected by the State Geologist and his assistants. The survey of the State had been entrusted to the very efficient superintendence of Dr. Houghton; and this eminent gentleman with the assistance of Dr. Sager as zoölogist and Dr. Wright as botanist, brought to the University a collection of unusual value. The specimens thus accumulated furnished at once excellent means of studying the geology, mineralogy, zoölogy and botany of the State. The cabinet was transferred to the University as a permanent possession by act of the Legislature in 1846.

The collections in the various branches of natural history thus early begun have steadily increased until the present time. Subsequent surveys in the State by Prof. Winchell and others have greatly enriched the collection in every department. The museum is also greatly indebted to the enterprise and generosity of alumni and other friends of the University and of science. The most important of these additions was made in 1879, when the whole of the collection made by Professor Steere in the course of his five years' explorations in South America, Formosa and the East Indies became the property of the University. This rich collection consists of about 25,000 insects, 1,500 shells and 8,000 birds, besides other representatives, amounting in all to about 10,000 entries. Numerous purchases have also been made by the Board of Regents.

It will be impossible in this connection to trace the growth of this important portion of the material outfit of the University. It will perhaps be sufficient to indicate in the briefest outline possible the present condition of the Museum.

The geological collection embraces a complete series of lithological and palæontological specimens, brought together by the different surveys of the State. Of the fossils in this collection more than a hundred have become types of original descriptions. To this series the White collection added 1,018 entries and 6,000 specimens; and the Rominger collection about 2,500 entries and 6,000 specimens, the latter being exceedingly interesting and valuable as illustrative of the Mesozoic formations of Central Europe. The Smithsonian Institution has also placed in this department of the museum an interesting collection of specimens of foreign and domestic stones, as well as a collection illustrating the fossils of the Upper Missouri. General Custer has presented an interesting collection of fossils from the Yellow stone valley. In addition to the legitimate products of the surveys, four cases of specimens illustrating the metalliferous regions of the Upper Peninsula were placed in the museum by Prof. Winchell. The entire cabinet for the use of students of geology and mineralogy contains about 14,000 entries and 41,000 specimens.

The zoölogical collection is somewhat more extensive than the geological. It contains a complete set of the birds which visit Michigan; a nearly complete set of the mammals of the State; and also a nearly complete set of the reptiles found east of the Rocky Mountains. There are also in the collection 2,000 species of mollusca, embracing all the land and fresh-water forms of the Northern and Western States. The Trowbridge collection, made on the Pacific coast, added to the museum 1,856 entries; and the Smithsonian deposit contributed 535 entries of fresh-water and marine shells from the same region, besides about 200 birds from the Arctic zone. The Ames collection of Coleoptera and Lepidoptera consists of about 5,000 specimens; and the cabinet for the special illustration of comparative anatomy, of not less than 250 species with 1,000 specimens. But the most important contribution ever made to this branch of the Museum consists of that collected by Dr. J. B. Steere in South America and the islands of the East Indies as above indicated. The zoölogical collection as a whole contains about 23,250 entries and somewhat more than 110,000 specimens.

The botanical collection embraces not only specimens of all the plants of the State, numbering about 1,175 species and 15,000 entries, but also numerous collections from other parts of the world. The Houghton herbarium contains 28 folio cases, and about 1,800 species of labeled plants brought together from various portions of the country. The Sager herbarium, of 1,200 species and 12,000 specimens, was collected partly in the Western States, but chiefly in New England. The Ames herbarium consists of no less than 7,000 specimens and 10,500 duplicates; and the Adams Jewett collection embraces 2,500 species and about 5,000 specimens. Professor Harrington has added to the museum 2,000 species; Captain Dall, an interesting collection of Alaskan plants, Professor Reinsch, 250 species of mosses, from Central Europe; Mr. Horace Averill, 408 species of algæ; Mr. J. G. Lemmon, 460 species of California plants and 60,000 specimens; Mr. S. S. Garrigues, about 3,000 specimens of plants from Germany. Professor Steere's collection adds to the museum some 2,500 specimens of South American and East Indian ferns. The entire collection for the illustration of the science of Botany embraces about 10,000 species, 20,000 entries and 70,000 specimens.

The Geological, Zoological, and Botanical cabinets together are estimated to contain about 60,000 entries and 255,000 specimens.

The Cabinet of Archæology and Relics contains various articles of domestic and warlike use among the aboriginal inhabitants of North and South America, and among the Islanders of the South Pacific. This embraces a large collection of pottery and other articles illustrative of the habits of the Ancient Peruvians, as well as specimens of clothing, art, military weapons, etc. of the Amazonian Indians, the modern Peruvians, the Alaskans, the Formosans, the Chinese, and the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands. To this collection, largely made by Professor Steere, have been added sundry relics from the islands of the Pacific by the Smithsonian Institution. The Department of Agriculture at Washington has also contributed a collection of textile fabrics and various substitutes for cotton.

The Cabinet of History and Fine Arts was begun in 1855. The first purchases for this department of the Museum were made in Europe by Professor Frieze, acting under a special commission of the Board of Regents. The articles procured at that time were chiefly plaster casts of antique statues, engravings and photographs illustrating the various departments of Grecian and Roman art. In 1862, Professor A. D. White received a similar commission from the Board. This resulted in the purchase of numerous articles for the collection, the most important of which were in bronze. About the same time, an association in Ann Arbor bought and presented to the University a marble copy of the Nydia by Mr. Randolph Rogers. The Museum at present comprises a gallery of casts, in full size and in reduction, of the most valuable antique statues and busts; a gallery of somewhat more than 200 reductions and models, in terra cotta, of statues, portrait busts, and other materials in the principal European museums; a gallery of engravings and photographic views, executed in Italy and Greece, illustrating the architectural and sculptural remains of Rome, Pompeii, Paestum, Athens, and Corinth; the Horace White collection of about 900 portrait medallions illustrative of mediæval and modern history; about 450 casts from antique gems; a collection of copies in plaster, marble and bronze, of several of the most important works of Michael Angelo, Canova, Thorwaldsen, and Randolph Rogers; and, finally, a collection of engraved copies of many of the great masterpieces of modern painting, beginning with the age prior to Raphael. The catalogue of the Cabinet of History and Fine Arts contains about 1,985 numbers.

Connected with the University there is also an important Museum of Anatomy and Materia Medica. The valuable collection made by Professor Ford in the course of many years of scientific labor, has become the property of the University. It is made up of materials for the direct purpose of the most successful teaching of the science of medicine, especially of those branches of it which pertain to the study of anatomy and physiology.

This portion of the Museum embraces a collection of bones designed to illustrate healthy as well as diseased conditions, also the various changes from infancy to old age. It contains numerous skulls, teeth and other preparations by which the structure and the various stages of both temporary and permanent teeth are illustrated. The arterial preparations embrace complete and partial dissections, exhibiting the arrangement of vessels in health and in disease. Models in wax, papier maché and plaster illustrate the various parts of the body in a normal as well as an abnormal condition. There is also a valuable collection, prepared by Professor Sager, illustrating the comparative craniology, neurology and embryology of the Vertebrata. The collection of monstrosities, both single and double, is unusually full and valuable. The materials illustrative of Materia Medica consist of a very complete set of crude organic medicinal substances, embracing between 500 and 600 specimens. These were imported from Paris, are put up in glass jars of uniform appearance, and are arranged according to their order in natural history. Besides these, the collection contains about 1,000 other specimens of mineral and vegetable substances and preparations, arranged in groups for the convenience of the student. In addition to the Medical Museum proper, which contains in the aggregate several thousand specimens, the department is abundantly supplied with plates, photographs, models, preparations, and apparatus for the purpose of illustrating the various studies of the medical course.

One of the most prosperous portions of the University has been the Chemical Laboratory. This important part of the educational facilities here afforded has grown up in response to the active and increasing demands of the students for instruction in applied chemistry. Under the superintendence of Professor Douglas, who was Director of the Laboratory from its beginning until 1877, it grew from a very humble commencement to be one of the largest and most perfectly equipped in the United States. The building was begun in 1855. It was enlarged in 1861, in 1867 and again in 1873. But even these extensive additions were not enough to supply the demand. An additional story to the entire building was erected in 1880, and it is believed that its facilities for the study of chemistry are not now exceeded by those of any laboratory in the world.

A very important adjunct of the University, and one which has reflected especial honor upon it, is the Astronomical Observatory. President Tappan, in his inaugural address, delivered December 21, 1852, showed how advantageously private munificence might supplement the endowment of the University; and expressed the hope that friends might be found who would be willing to erect an astronomical observatory. On the evening of the same day, the Hon. H. N. Walker, of Detroit, called upon the President and expressed a wish to do something for the University in accordance with the suggestions of the address. Dr. Tappan entered into a discussion of the matter with great interest, and the interview resulted in an appointment to meet the friends of the enterprise a few days later at the Michigan Exchange in Detroit.

At the meeting held in accordance with this appointment, on the 29th of December, President Tappan unfolded his project, and with most encouraging results. Seven thousand dollars were subscribed on the spot, to be paid within a year, on condition that $10,000 be raised. The whole was to be expended under the direction of the President, for the erection and furnishing of a building, to be known as the Detroit Observatory, to be forever connected with the University. The plan at first proposed contemplated simply a telescope, with a building sufficient for its accommodation; but the unexpected liberality with which the project had been received induced Dr. Tappan to enlarge his purpose so as to embrace nothing less than the erection and equipment of a complete astronomical observatory. Mr. Walker and other friends of the enterprise encouraged the President to proceed upon this basis. Accordingly in the February following Dr. Tappan, in company with Mr. Walker, visited New York, and soon afterward made a contract with Mr. Henry Fitz to furnish an achromatic refracting telescope. The instrument was to be mounted in Ann Arbor on or before the first day of June, 1854, and was to be in size second only to the great refractors at Cambridge, Mass., and at Pulkowa, in Russia. The price to be paid was $6,150.

It seemed exceedingly desirable that the other equipments of the Observatory should be correspondingly extensive. But the amount already subscribed would not allow of so liberal and extensive a plan. The generosity of Mr. Walker, however, encouraged the President to go forward. As the latter was on the point of visiting Europe, the former placed in his hands the means to purchase a meridian circle of the largest and most expensive kind.

In Europe, President Tappan, after visiting the principal observatories in England, France and Italy, reached Berlin, where he became acquainted with the distinguished astronomer, Encke, and his assistant, Dr. Brünnow. In accordance with the recommendations of these gentlemen, he employed Messrs. Pistor and Martins, of Berlin, to construct the meridian circle, and Mr. Tiede to construct an astronomical clock. The instruments were made under the direction of Messrs. Encke and Brünnow, and to the entire satisfaction of the astronomers.

While these instruments were in process of construction, the Regents purchased about five acres of ground on an eminence commanding an unobstructed view of the horizon in every direction, at a distance of about half a mile from the University grounds. On this eminence was constructed the Observatory, in accordance with plans and specifications furnished by Prof. Bull, of New York.

As the buildings and instruments were approaching completion, it remained to procure the services of an astronomer competent to undertake the direction of the Observatory. The neglect which the science of astronomy had suffered in America seemed to render it necessary to look abroad for some one fitted to undertake this duty. Dr. Brünnow, who had so earnestly and disinterestedly exerted himself in supervising the construction of the instruments, appeared to the President to be the best person for the position. This selection received the cordial and unanimous approval of the friends of the enterprise, and accordingly Dr. Brünnow, was unanimously elected Director of the Observatory and Professor of Astronomy. He accepted the position, and, arriving at Ann Arbor in July, entered at once upon the labors of his office.

In due time the building was completed for the reception of the instruments. The equatorial telescope was mounted upon a central pier, which has a foundation 15 feet below the surface and arises in the form of a truncated cone about 40 feet above. The instrument is covered by a hemispherical revolving dome 23 feet in diameter, with an opening 18 inches wide extending from the horizon to the zenith. The east wing of the building was devoted to the meridian circle and its accompanying instruments. The refracting telescope has a clear aperture of $12\frac{3}{8}$ inches, and a focal length of 17 feet 8 inches. It is supplied with a complete outfit of eye-pieces, micrometers and shades. The observer is also furnished with a chronograph, with Bond's new isodynamic escapement for recording observations by the electro-magnetic method. On the completion of the Observatory it was regarded as one of the most perfectly equipped in the country.

A further subscription to liquidate the debt incurred in its construction was raised in Detroit; and again, in 1865, about $5,000 were contributed by the citizens of Detroit and Ann Arbor to erect a dwelling-house for the use of the Observer.

It is a satisfaction to be able to record that the generosity of the donors of the Observatory has been exceedingly fruitful of scientific results. Under the efficient direction of Dr. Brünnow, the Observatory immediately took very high rank in the scientific world. In addition to the work of giving instruction to University students, the Director was able to carry on numerous scientific researches, which received the most gratifying recognition. Dr. Brünnow published an important work on Spherical Astronomy, besides the Tables of Flora and the Tables of Victoria, in addition to very numerous articles in the scientific journals of Europe and America. It is perhaps not important to give the title of the papers published, but during the first two years of the active operations of the Observatory the number of these was no less than twenty-six.

In 1858, Mr. James C. Watson, the first pupil of Dr. Brünnow in the University, and a graduate of the class of 1857, was appointed Assistant Observer, and in 1859, Professor of Astronomy. On the permanent retirement of Professor Brünnow in 1863, Mr. Watson, on the recommendation of many of the first astronomers of the country, was chosen his successor, as Director of the Observatory as well as Professor of Astronomy. This position he continued to fill until 1879, when he tendered his resignation, to accept of the Directorship of the Washburn Observatory at the University of Wisconsin.

During Prof. Watson's Directorship of 16 years, although he was only 25 years of age at the time of his appointment, the list of discoveries and contributions made by him form a record which would give permanent fame to any observatory.

The generous contributors to the fund for the building and equipment of the Detroit Observatory may well be proud of its record; for under the able directorship of Dr. Brünnow and Dr. Watson it has taken position among the first in the world.

We here bring our sketch of the University of Michigan to a close. Its history has not been unvarying or monotonous. We have seen something of difficulties and triumphs; but, in concluding our narrative, it is a satisfaction to reflect, that if the former show that a State university is no less subject to perils than are institutions resting upon other foundations, the latter afford abundant demonstration that these perils may be overcome. The history of the University of Michigan goes far to prove, if indeed it does not prove conclusively, that higher education, no less than the education afforded by the common schools, may be safely and satisfactorily conducted by the people of an intelligent State.

In addition to the foregoing, by Prof. Adams, a short description of some of the main buildings, as they now stand, will not be out of place. A list of the graduates from Washtenaw county is also appended.

In securing the location of the University for Ann Arbor, its history would not be complete without reference to the men who donated the ground on which the buildings are located. They were William R. Thompson, William S. Maynard, Charles Thayer, E. W. Morgan, each of whom gave one-fifth, and Augustus Garrett and Daniel B. Brown, one-tenth each. The entire donation was 40 acres.

UNIVERSITY HALL.

University Hall is located on the west side of the College Campus, and the entire expense of the buildings was $100,000, and is the architectural designing of E. S. Jennison, of Chicago, Illinois, a former graduate of the University of Michigan. The wood work of the same was under the supervision of Adolph Martin, of Chicago, Illinois. The dimensions of the hall, as furnished by the Secretary of the University, Henry D. Bennett, are as follows: It is 133 by 140 feet, and is about 70 feet high from the base to the frieze, with an elegantly proportioned dome 140 feet high, surmounted by a beautiful statue of "Rogers' Michigan." The auditorium is 80 by 130 feet, and is capable of seating comfortably 3,000 persons. The chapel, which is located on the first floor, has a seating capacity for 600. On the same floor there is also a lecture room, with seatings for 400. The steward's room is located in the southwest corner of the building, on the same floor, and connected with which is the massive fire-proof vault for the protection of the archives of the University. Adjoining this is located the chancellor's room. East of the transverse hall is the ladies' waiting room, opposite is situated the faculty room; and on the same floor are two large lecture or recitation rooms. Directly above, in the second, third and fourth stories, are located, in each, three commodious class or recitation rooms. The building is heated by John Davis & Co.'s (Chicago, Illinois) steam-heating Apparatus, is ventilated with great care, and the whole is most splendidly fitted up with gas. The two wings to this massive and elegant building are each 40 by 110 feet, and four stories high. The north wing was formerly used for the museum. The south wing is principally for recitation rooms, literary societies, and Students' Christian Association.

LAW DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

This is situated on the northwest corner of the College Campus, and is, for its general appearance, a very strong and massive building, three stories high. It has on the first floor a general library of over 20,000 volumes, which is accessible to students and citizens every day, Sundays excepted. There are also on the same floor the offices of the President, Dean of the Law Faculty, and a moot-court room. On the second floor are located the Law Library, and a large lecture room; also the Law Professor's room. The third floor is occupied by the Webster and Jeffersonian Societies, together with the regular moot-court room.

LABORATORY OF CHEMISTRY AND PHARMACY.

This building is unostentatious in its appearance, yet is quite large, being one story and a half high, built of brick, and arranged with a view to the greatest possible convenience for those pursuing chemistry and pharmacy, and is beyond doubt the most extensive and thoroughly equipped laboratory in the United States, if not on the continent. The building is healthfully ventilated by steam power, is warmed by steam, and supplied with gas and water.

MEDICAL DEPARTMENT BUILDING.

This large and spacious building has two amphitheatres, each capable of seating over 400 students. It is composed of two large buildings, forming a "T," the principal or main structure nearly or quite square, four-stories high, while the old or original building is long and narrow, and three-stories high; but the two making together a very fine and noble appearance.

STATE NORMAL SCHOOL.

The question of establishing a normal school in Michigan was considered by the Legislature of the State, and an act passed during the first session of 1849, appropriating 25 sections of "Salt Spring Lands" toward the support of the institution. A committee of Superintendents was appointed under the act, of whom Hon. Samuel Bristow was made chairman, for the purpose of selecting a location and the erection of suitable buildings for the school. With characteristic liberality, the citizens of Ypsilanti raised the sum of $13,500, and offered a tract of land for its location at this point. Their offer was accepted in 1851, and the committee partaking somewhat of the zeal and enthusiasm of the citizens of the city, commenced the work of erection of a building, and in the fall of 1852 reported it complete.

The State Normal School is located on the plateau west of the Huron. The building is of brick, tastefully painted, and a model of school architecture. The area of each floor is 100 by 58 feet; there are three floors above the basement, the first of which is divided into model-room, reception-room, recitation-room, and library. The second and third floors are devoted to school-rooms.

THE FIRST BOARDS

comprised O. S. Jackson, A. S. Welch, A. C. Rogers, and J. M. B. Sill, on the Board of Teachers; Chauncey Joslyn, Isaac E. Crary, and G. O. Whittemore, on the Board of Control, with Lt. Gov. Fenton, State Treasurer B. C. Whittemore, and Superintendent Sherman as ex-officio members.

DEDICATORY CEREMONIES.

The dedication of the building to the cause of education took place October 5, 1852. The exercises were of a religio-literary character of a most pleasing nature, and proved a prelude to the general good order which has marked the progress of the State Normal School. The faculty of this institution for 1880-1 is composed as follows:—Dr. McVicker, Principal, Charles FitzRoy Bel lows, M. A., C. E., Lewis McLouth, M. A., Daniel Putnam, M. A., Jos. P. Vroman, M. A., Austin George, M. A., August Lode-man, Frederick H. Pease, Ruth Hoppin, M. A., Helen Post, Fanny E. Goff, and Elizabeth I. Coates.

CHAPTER XIII.

VARIOUS THINGS.

THE PATRIOT WAR.*

It will be remembered by the pioneers of Michigan, and not only by them, but by all others, of that time along the frontier line between the United States and Canada, that during the winter of 1837-38, occurred what was known as the "Patriot War." The object of this war was understood to be a revolution that should separate the British possessions of Canada from the mother country that they might erect themselves into sovereign and independent States.

In consequence of the financial crash and hard times then prevailing there were many adventurous, reckless and idle persons in the States who took part with the Patriots. The anxiety that grew out of our Revolutionary war and the war of 1812, toward the British, may have slumbered, but was not forgotten, and it took but little to awaken that old feeling. It was revived along the whole length of the frontier, and was not confined to our side only; it was fully reciprocated by our loyal neighbors. At that time, as it may be now, there were many half-pay English military officers who would have hailed a war between the United States and England as a God-send to them; for in that event they would be restored to active service on full pay and stand their chances for promotion. The hostile feeling had reached such a degree of intensity that General Scott was ordered to the frontier with troops. The steamer Carolina, that was supposed to be in the service of the Patriots, was captured in the Niagara river by the British forces, and sent over the falls and it was supposed with part of the crew on board. The Patriots had at that time a considerable force on Navy island. A rocket brigade was stationed at Windsor. Occasional musket shots were fired from Windsor into Detroit, and a correspondence was opened between the authorities on each side with a view to stop this recklessness. The late Adjutant General John E. Schwartz conducted the correspondence on the part of Michigan. He read it to the writer of this paper.

"About this time I visited Detroit, stopping at the National Hotel, as the Russell House was then called, and before I had time to warm myself I met Col. Smith, then a member of the Legislature, from Monroe county, who invited me into the back parlor, under orders from the Governor to march down the Detroit river and break up the encampment of Patriots in the neighborhood of Gibraltar, a small village near the mouth of the river, and drive them away. I had also an order, addressed to the late Col. Slingerland, to muster his (the 5th) regiment from which to recruit my company by volunteers, if possible, or by draft. The Colonel issued his orders and did his duty, but so strong was the sympathy in favor of the Patriots and against the English, that not over thirty men out of about 600 composing the regiment obeyed the colonel's order. Of course I was obliged to report my inability to report the company ordered. My recollection is that Colonel Smith made a similar report and the encampment remained undisturbed.

"The leaders of the Patriots had organized a secret society known as Hunters, with lodges in every village along the frontier. They had their secret signs, grips and pass-words, and were sworn to secrecy. A large proportion of the able-bodied men were Hunters, that is, members of Hunters' lodges. I mention these facts to show the state of public feeling with regard to the Patriot war and the reason that Gov. Mason could not furnish the necessary force to march on the Patriot encampment and disperse the force there encamped. Before the close of navigation an expedition was organized by Brigadier General Theller, of the Patriot service, for the purpose of capturing Fort Malden. He embarked in the sloop Ann, and when she arrived off the fort was fired into and her rigging so cut up that she became unmanageable and drifted ashore. The General and Colonel Dodge (I believe his name was) and the crew were taken prisoners. That winter a landing of a Patriot force was made on the Canada shore above Windsor, and a battle fought which proved disastrous to the invaders. Another battle was fought at Point au Pelee, where the Patriots were victors. From these facts it can be seen that the magazine was ready and needed but a spark to explode it,—that is, to involve the country in war.

"When these events were taking place, but before the fight at Point au Pelee, General Sutherland, of the Patriot army, made his appearance at Ann Arbor in full uniform and posted hand-bills notifying the public that he would address them at the court-house on the subject of the Patriot war. The court-room was filled and the General was listened to with respect and attention. Before the meeting dispersed a committee was appointed to wait on the General at his quarters, to confer with him. The writer was one of that committee. The committee called on the General that evening at his room, and spent an hour or two with him. From Ann Arbor he went to Manchester to address the good people of that village. His object was to get men and means to carry on the war. A short time afterward I received a package of where I met Gov. Mason, who ordered me back to Ann Arbor to raise a company of militia and report to Col. Smith, who was then papers from the General. Among them were enlistment rolls and a long letter. He wished me to join the Patriot army and raise a battalion of men for the Patriot service, but ostensibly as volunteer militia, hold elections for commissioned officers as directed by the militia laws of Michigan, and apply to Governor Mason for commissions. He said that as I was a personal and political friend of the Governor there would be no difficulty in getting the commissions. This accomplished, I was to put myself and battalion under the orders of the General, and as soon as the Detroit river was frozen over so as to make a passage safe, he would give me an order for arms, ammunitions, blankets etc., and he would direct when and where the invasion should take place. I confess to a complete surprise,—more, I was astonished. We were almost entire strangers to each other; we had never met except at Ann Arbor, and then only for an hour or two, and knew nothing of each other's antecedents. During the visit of the committee at the General's room I endeavored to draw him into a conversation upon military subjects, tactics, history etc., but he evaded it, and I formed a small opinion of his military capacity or knowledge. And when he divulged to me, an almost entire stranger, his plan of operations, I lost confidence in him as a military leader. I remembered of reading an anecdote of Washington who was asked by an intimate friend and true Whig what his plan of campaign was. Washington asked, 'Can you keep a secret?' 'Yes, General.' 'So can I,' was the response. When the Legislative committee visited General Jackson and demanded of him his plan for the defense of New Orleans, he raised a lock of hair from his head and said, 'Gentlemen, if I supposed this lock of hair knew what was passing in my brain on that subject, I would cut it off and burn it.'

"I have described the feeling along the dividing line between the States and Canada. I remember that Sutherland said that one of his principal objects was to involve the two countries in war with each other. Doing this he would attain the height of his ambition. I believe there would have been but little difficulty in enlisting the number of men to fill the four companies required, and it seemed plain to me, that after receiving our commissions, and before the ink of the Governor's signature was fairly dry on them, Sutherland would have ordered a forward movement at a place where we would have been met by an overwhelming force and been compelled to surrender. I could come to no other conclusion than that Sutherland was false to the cause he pretended to espouse. If we had been taken prisoners, of course we would have claimed the treatment of prisoners of war. This may have been accorded to us in consideration of our commissions and we not have been hanged as Cunningham, Linn, Lount and others were. If the invasion had taken place, that might have been regarded by our Canadian neighbors as a commencement of hostilities on the part of the United States and as a sufficient justification for the Rocket Brigade to open on Detroit and burn it. At that time there were no troops there except the Brady Guards, an excellent company of volunteer militia of less than 100 men. What the consequences would have been if Sutherland's order had been obeyed others may infer. I remembered that Sutherland told me that he had called meetings and made speeches through Oakland county as he had in Washtenaw. My duty seemed plain and simple, and I lost no time in going to Detroit with this package of papers. I found the Governor in his office in the old capitol, and as soon as we were left alone I told him my errand and laid the papers before him. He read them attentively and arose from his chair and walked the office for some minutes without uttering a word. It was plain to be seen that a storm was brewing. At length it burst out in language more forcible than polite,—too forcible for me to repeat in this paper. My impression was that if Sutherland had been present he would have felt the weight of the Governor's arm. A more angry man I have seldom seen. After the engagement at Point au Pelee occurred, Sutherland, under the pretense of joining the victorious Patriots at the Point, attempted to pass Fort Malden with a horse and cutter on the ice and was captured by some of the garrison of the fort, which he probably intended to be, and with Theller and Col. Dodge was held as a prisoner until the spring opened, when the three were taken to Quebec and confined in a cell in one of the fortresses there. Theller and Dodge made their escape from the prison, and, after returning, Theller told me that on their journey down, which was by private conveyance (there were no railroads then), he and Dodge were confined in jails nights but Sutherland was entertained at hotels. On reaching their prison, the three were shut up in the same cell for awhile, but so strong were their impressions that Sutherland was in British pay and a traitor to the Patriot cause that they laid plans to get rid of him. They believed him a spy on them; they found him a coward and so worked upon his fears until he was removed. After Theller and Dodge had the cell to themselves they applied themselves to work and effected their escape and returned to Michigan. The Canadian struggle for national independence was unsuccessful.

“Another expedition was planned at Detroit for the capture of Fort Malden, and was to sail from that city under the command of a general from Cleveland. It had been ascertained that the garrison was lodged in the Queen's warehouse at the foot of the wharf, and the officers quartered at hotels in the village of Amherstburg, and that at night there was but a small force on guard at the fort. Three steamboats were to be employed, and when they arrived off the fort one boat was to lay across the head of the wharf, and the other two one on each side; one party should march directly to the fort and take it; the second should capture the garrison in the warehouse; and the third should capture the officers. This was to be done in the night. And however feasible the plan was, it was hinted that the General lacked the nerve to undertake it. It was like the 'cause,' a failure. After the escape of Theller and Dodge, Sutherland was set at liberty without trial and without punishment, proving further that he was a traitor to the patriots. He wandered to the far West, to the verge of civilization, and after a few years died."

WILD-CAT BANKS.

In the year 1835, Samuel W. Foster and John Holden, of Scio, in Washtenaw county, applied to the Bank of Michigan in Detroit, for a loan of money to buy wheat to stock their mill. The bank could not accommodate them but referred them to a broker doing business in the basement of the bank building, where they found money if they would submit to a "shave." On their return home they conceived the plan on which the "wild-cat" banks were got up. Foster showed the plan, and a petition to the Legislature for the law under which the banks were created, to the writer. The bill passed with but few dissenting votes. Our fellow citizen, Hon. Alpheus Felch, then Representative, Robert Purdy, of Washtenaw, John Almy, of Kent, and Isaac Monfore, of St. Clair, were the four who voted against the bill. The basis of the banks was a small per cent. of the capital in specie and the redemption of the bills to be secured by mortgage on real estate. Very soon after the passage of the law, banks sprang up all over the State, and their bills were as plenty as blackberries. In this county there was one in Ann Arbor, called Miller's Bank of Washtenaw, situated on the north corner of Brown street and Broadway, in the fifth ward, of which Charles Thayer was president, and it is believed that it was the only one of the whole batch in Michigan that was conducted honestly and paid all its indebtedness.

Another was started at Lowell. The reader may ask, Where is Lowell? Why, on section 32, in Superior, on the Huron river, a mile or thereabouts below Geddes' saw-mill. Another at Ypsilanti, one at Saline, one at Manchester and one at the Village of Sharon. In some cases where the stockholders had not enough land of their own, they mortgaged a piece of Uncle Sam's just to piece out with. Fortunes were made in a few months. New cities and villages sprang up as fast as surveyors could plat them, and large, splendid topographic maps of them with contemplated railroads, hotels and mills, large parks were dedicated for public use, great names were given to the streets and avenues; and after all a stranger would need a guide to find them. In Washtenaw we had our Boston, Newport, Saratoga of Michigan, Windham and Sharon. Where are they? The plats of them are on record in the Register's office. Men built fine houses, furnished them handsomely, and set up their carriages and lived sumptuously. Hon. Alpheus Felch was appointed Bank Commissioner. He was known to be honest, and a man that could not be swerved from an honest discharge of his duty, and the bank officers attempted sharp practice. Specie boxes were procured and filled nearly full with old scrap iron from a blacksmith shop, which was covered with specie, and Mr. Commissioner was asked to take the mint count as marked on the box, but he was not caught so easily. The boxes were turned over and emptied on the floor and the fraud exposed. Another trick was tried. The banks clubbed together and procured specie sufficient for any one bank, and while the Commissioner was making his examination he was inquired of what bank he intended to examine next. When that was ascertained, the specie which had been hastily repacked, was loaded into a wagon and hurried off to the bank indicated. But the Commissioner was too sharp for them. While the specie was going in one direction, Mr. Commissioner had changed his mind and took another. When he was expected at the "Farmers' Bank of Sandstone" he was at the "Farmers' Bank of Sharon." When he was expected in Calhoun county he was in Lenawee county. The country was running wild with speculations. Farmers left their fields untilled, the mechanic his shop, the merchants their counting-rooms, the lawyers their offices, and even women left their homes and plunged deeply into fortune making. Prices of everything were inflated; every one was rich (in imagination). The "Specie Circular" was issued and the bubble was stabbed, it collapsed, and lo, it was but a bubble. Prices fell with accelerated motion, fortunes vanished as if by magic. Those who had set up their fine carriages were compelled to dispose of them as best they could, or the sheriff did it for them. Ninety-nine in a hundred of the speculators were left without a dollar and many debts hanging over them.

Congress came to the aid of the fallen with the general bankrupt law, and a large number paid their debts by availing themselves of it. Those who remember those days know that the mania was not confined to Michigan, nor chargeable wholly to the wild-cat banks beyond the boundaries of our own State.

TEMPERANCE.

In every stage of the world's progress, intoxication has existed to a greater or less extent, and the reformer has exercised his influence to prevent its spread or to eradicate the evil entirely. In the first half of the present century but few large distilleries existed, while every neighborhood must have its "still." A new settlement was no sooner formed than an enterprising individual would erect his still and commence the manufacture of whisky, pure and unadulterated. The surplus corn of the country could be used in no other way, at least such was thought to be the case. The first issue of the Western Emigrant, published at Ann Arbor in 1829, contained the advertisement of a distillery, while every merchant advertised whisky as one of the specialties of his store. The whisky-jug was thought an indispensable help in the harvest field, or at house-raising, log-rollings and corn-huskings; nor was the decanter, with its exhilarating contents, generally wanting at social gatherings. Liquor bought by the gallon, and even by the barrel, was kept in the household for daily use. Before partaking of breakfast, the glass was passed around to give an appetite. When bittered with some herb or drug, it was used as a sovereign remedy for most of the ailments flesh is heir to, and often as a preventive. Liquor being one of the specialties in the early country stores, some merchants were wont to treat their customers, especially when making large bills, and often previous to purchasing in order to sharpen their appetite for trading. Happily, these habits have become obsolete among the better classes of society, and it is hoped will never be revived.

While intemperance largely exists, it is evident that it has greatly decreased within the present generation. According to population there are not as many drunkards, nor is there as much liquor consumed as a third of a century ago. This leads to the further declaration that can well be substantiated, that the efforts put forth by temperance people in times past have not proven a failure. That organizations have flourished for a time and then ceased to exist prove nothing. These organizations were but human instrumentalities brought forth by the necessities of the hour, their design being to accomplish a certain purpose then apparent. It is not to be expected that they will be as enduring as the hills, or so strong that "the gates of hell shall not prevail against them." If they accomplish a good work for the time being, well and good. If it is found there is a radical defect in their organizations necessitating a change, let it be made, and let it not be imagined because they are defective and have not accomplished all the good their most sanguine supporters anticipated, that nothing has been done. All over the country can be found sober, honest and good men, who, but for the efforts put forth by the members of some temperance organization that has ceased to exist, would now fill a drunkard's grave.

Whisky was generally sold for cash—all other goods on credit. Of course it was not expensive, as a good quality could be purchased for two or three shillings a gallon. Occasionally some impecunious persons, desiring to go on a spree, having no money, were required to resort to their wits to procure the liquid fluid. A good story is told of a crowd who were so situated. One of their number got a jug and, filling it about half full of water, went to a grocery and called for a quart of whisky, remarking that some of the boys wished to have a little fun, but didn't have quite whisky enough. The whisky was drawn, and the man picked up the jug and started for the door, without saying a word about paying for it. The proprietor told him to come back, as whisky was cash. The man said he had no money. "Well, you can't have the whisky then," was the reply. Appearing mad, the man stepped back, and with an oath, told the proprietor to take his old whisky. The quart was drawn out of the jug, when it was again taken to the public well and more water put in. A second grocery was visited, another quart of whisky was drawn and emptied back. Again he went to the well for more water, and a third place was visited, and a half gallon was called for, poured in the jug and drawn off. The man appeared mad, but it was just what he desired to be done, so he left the third place with a half gallon of as good whisky as the merchant had poured back in his barrel from the jug. This was a first-class article, and the boys were thus afforded a rare chance for a good drunk, after the most approved style.

Although the whisky of that early day was said to be pure, yet it would "make the drunk come;" men would become shiftless from its continued use; houses would be neglected; heart-broken and sorrowing wives, ragged and hungry children, existed, and all from the use of rum.

The first steps taken to arrest this evil in Washtenaw county was in the winter of 1829-'30. The following notice appeared in two successive issues of the Emigrant, under date of Dec. 22 and 29:

Public Meeting.—There will be a meeting of the citizens of Dexter [the township of Dexter, which embraced all the territory west of Ann Arbor], at the house of Samuel W. Dexter, at 2 o'clock p. m., on the first day of the New Year, to take into consideration the best method of arresting the destructive use of ardent spirits.

About the same time meetings were held at Ann Arbor and various other places throughout the county, and a temperance pledge was circulated, receiving numerous signatures. The warfare against intemperance was now here begun, and to the honor of the first movers in this glorious work, they began at the bottom. They did not believe in temporizing with the evil. It was right or it was wrong to partake of intoxicating liquors. There was no middle ground to occupy.

Meetings were held with more or less frequency until the time of the Washingtonian movement, in 1841, when a revival of interest was had and the old wheel-horses returned to the charge. Many at this time were induced to sign the pledge. The good work resulting from this movement can never be estimated. In turn, have the Sons of Temperance, the Temple of Honor, and the Good Templars pursued their work in this county, each in its way, doing great good.

RAILROADS.

If the inventor of steam as a propelling power and of the locomotive as a means of transportation could be permitted to return from the "better world" and view the net work of railroads now extending all over the land, penetrating even the remote countries of the east where we are wont to associate all travel with the camel and ass, their minds would be filled with astonishment. The Yankee mind was quick to seize upon the idea of the inventor, and railroads were at once projected in various parts of the Union. The Territory of Michigan, though possessed of a population of but a few thousand souls, soon took steps to secure the building of a road through from Detroit to Lake Michigan. In 1831 the Detroit & St. Joseph railroad, or Central railroad, was chartered, with a capital of $1,500,000. The road was to run directly through this county, and through the villages of Ann Arbor, Ypsilanti and Dexter. It had been commenced and was in progress, when in 1837 the State purchased the road and chartered rights of the company and completed it to Ypsilanti in January, 1838. The Gazetteer of Michigan, published in the fall of 1838, says of this road: "There were at last date four locomotive engines in operation, five passage and 10 freight cars. The business was increasing upon the means of transportation. The average weekly receipts for the six or eight weeks previous to the first of July, was about $2,500. Up to the 24th of May, 4,500 persons had been transported from Detroit to Ypsilanti, mostly emigrants, 1,600 to intermediate places, making 6,100. The road is constructing from Ypsilanti to Ann Arbor, and will be completed by the first of October, 1838."

Notwithstanding expectations, the road was not completed to Ann Arbor until 1839, and to Dexter on the 4th of July, 1841.

The first public railroad meeting in Washtenaw county was held at Ann Arbor, Sept. 3, 1834. Over $400 was raised to pay the expenses of a survey across the Territory from Detroit to St. Joseph. Another meeting was held Dec. 6, 1834, and a resolution passed favorable to the presentation of a petition to Congress to aid in the construction of the road.

On the 5th of December, 1835, a meeting was held and a committee appointed to solicit subscriptions to the capital stock of the road. David Page, Edward L. Fuller, William R. Thompson, Charles Thayer, and James Kingsley were appointed said committee. The subscription received was authorized to be paid on the following conditions: 1. That a reasonable portion of the officers of said company shall be located in the village of Ann Arbor, or vicinity. 2. That the road shall be commenced at the village of Ann Arbor the same time as at Detroit, and the amount of subscriptions here obtained to be expended in the construction of the road from Ann Arbor east. These conditions were never complied with by the company.

Oct. 17, 1839, the road was completed to Ann Arbor. For weeks previous arrangements were in progress for a grand celebration of the event. A committee of 20 had the arrangements in charge, and everything possible was done to make the occasion one long to be remembered. Says the Western Emigrant of Oct. 23, 1839:

"Last Thursday was a proud and happy day for Ann Arbor. Although the people of Michigan have great cause to complain of the outrageous inefficiency of those heretofore entrusted with the building of this road, and of the procrastination of the event which thousands finally had an opportunity of celebrating in an appropriate manner, yet all party feeling was now checked by common consent, and all were disposed to forget the delay in the general rejoicing and conviviality of the occasion. A more lovely day never dawned. Our Indian summer, as was anticipated, reigned in all its softness and deliciousness. All was gaiety and delight. People came from all quarters, to witness the arrival of the cars for the first time at our new and beautiful depot, and to aid our citizens in the reception and entertainment of their civil and military guests. At noon the cars arrived, bringing upward of a thousand visitors from Detroit. They were met at the depot by the committee of arrangements, who welcomed them through the Hon. James Kingsley, in a brief but appropriate speech. George C. Bates, Esq., on behalf of the common council of Detroit, made a felicitous reply, after which the procession formed and marched through the principal streets to the court-house square, where a splendid banquet had been prepared by Messrs. Clark and Petty, of the Exchange. Here the Brady guard pitched their tents, and a general interchange of good feeling between them and the Washtenaw guards followed. A detachment of the Pittsfield volunteer corps came in, and we should infer from their soldier-like appearance that the whole company would have been, as they were, an acquisition to the pageantry of the day.

"The dinner went off well, notwithstanding a burning noon-day sun kept many from partaking. After the cloth was removed, a great many enthusiastic toasts were drank, among which were the following:

"The first train from the city of Detroit—It brings with it a long train of pleasing reflections.

"The State of Michigan—Internal improvements necessary to the development of her abundant natural resources.

"Railroads and Canals—The business of months is now done in a day; if they do not lengthen our years, they enable us to live more in the same time.

"The Central Railroad—The Michigan link in the great chain from the sea-board to the Mississippi.

"Railroads and Steam power—A Yankee's notion of the Utile cum dulce.

"The City of Detroit and the Village of Ann Arbor—Next door neighbors.

"The company broke up about three o'clock, and the citizens of Detroit generally returned in the cars that afternoon, gratified, we doubt not, with their visit."

At Dexter, a celebration was also held in honor of the event. The road was pushed on to Jackson, where it ceased building operations for a time, and in 1846 it was completed to Kalamazoo. It was now sold by the State to the Michigan Central Railroad Company for $2,000,000.

In 1836 the Palmyra & Jacksonburg railroad was chartered. Its route lay through Tecumseh, Clinton, and Manchester to Jackson. This line afterward passed into the hands of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern railroad, and is now operated as the Jackson Branch of that road. It enters the county on sec. 32, tp. 4 S. of range 4 east, and running north and northwest enters township 4 south, of range 3 east, running west passes out of the county from section 6, same township and range. The road has but one station in this county—Manchester, a flourishing village in the town of Manchester.

During the same year in which the Palmyra & Jacksonburg railroad was chartered, the "Monroe & Ann Arbor" and the "Ypsilanti & Tecumseh" roads were also chartered, but neither of which was ever built.

The Detroit, Hillsdale & Indiana railroad was projected shortly after the war, and completed through this county in 1870. It starts from Ypsilanti, running through the towns of Ypsilanti, Pittsfield, Saline, Bridgewater and Manchester, with stations at Saline, Bridgewater and Manchester. The road runs west to Hillsdale, where it connects and runs in conjunction with other roads west and south.

The Toledo, Ann Arbor & Northern railroad was discussed many years before any successful effort was made in finishing the work. It was completed from Toledo to Ann Arbor in 1878.

The Detroit, Howell & Lansing, now the Detroit, Lansing & Northern railroad was projected in 1868, and was completed through the northeast part of the town of Salem in 1870. This is the only part of the county touched by the road. In the construction of the road, aid was solicited from the towns along its route. At an election held in Salem, the inspectors declared the proposition carried donating to the company $20,000. The legality of this act was doubted by some, resulting in a lawsuit, which reached the Supreme Court, that body deciding adversely to the railroad.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The first public building erected in Washtenaw county was for the confinement of violators of the law, and was built on a lot of ground donated by E. W. Rumsey for that purpose, and ever since known as the "Jail Square." A local writer thus speaks of this old jail and its first occupants:

"About the year 1829, the citizens of Ann Arbor and vicinity contributed, each according to his ability, some timber, lumber, work or other materials necessary for the construction of a building that would answer for a county prison. Such an edifice was built on the 'old jail square,' with rooms for the jailor and one cell. The cell was made of timber 'bents.' The shoulders of the posts of each bent projected over the ends of the timbers of which the floor was made. Heavy oak planks were spiked on the walls and floor. The door was made of timber. At the next term of the county court after the jail was built, Judge Dexter, the presiding judge, ordered the grand jury to visit the jail and inspect it, and report if in their opinion it was suitable for the purposes for which it was constructed.

- "Quite a number of the jurymen had served as grand jurymen before, and being of genial dispositions, and loving a little fun when there was nothing else to do, framed a set of by-laws which imposed fines for various offenses, such as being absent at roll-call, etc., payable in beer. Every member who had not served as a grand jurymen, or held office in a grand jury, was made to pay his initiation fee. When the order for visiting and inspecting the jail was received by the foreman, Col. Orrin White, and made known to the jury, it was voted that they should form in a body and march in double file, led by the foreman and secretary (Gen. Edward Clark, of Ann Arbor) under the supervision of the officer in charge. His vote was obeyed. On arriving at the jail the cell door was thrown open and the foreman and secretary stepped in, when the door was closed upon them and locked. The merry faces of the 'old ones' were at the diamond hole and the question asked, 'Do you see a gallon of beer each?' Little notice was taken of this at first, but finally the required beer was promised, the door was unlocked and the balance of the jury came in, but not until after a plan had been agreed upon by the two prisoners. While the others were inspecting, the foreman and secretary quietly moved around the cell toward the door, and before their object was suspected they were outside and the door closed and locked. Once more the question was asked, 'Do you see a gallon of beer each?' When the fine was promised, the door was opened. The report of that jury to the court was, that the jail was worthy of the acceptance of Washtenaw county. No prisoner ever escaped from it only 'by due process of law.' Israel Branch was the first jailor of the county."

The Old Court-House.—Several years had passed after the organization of the county before steps were taken for the erection of a court-house. In the winter of 1833, the Legislative Council passed an act enabling the Board of Supervisors to issue the bonds of the county and levy tax for their payment at maturity. In 1834 the building was erected, and for forty-four years served as the temple of justice, when it became too small and unsuited to a wealthy and growing county, and so gave place to the elegant structure that now ornaments the public square. A lithographic view of the old court-house appears elsewhere in this work.

The New Court-House.—The question of building a new court-house was long considered by the people of the county, and especially those living in the city of Ann Arbor, before any definite action was taken by the Board of Supervisors. The old court-house had for years been considered a disgrace by the people, but the fear of taxation had prevented any steps being taken for the erection of a new one.

In 1876, the Common Council of the city of Ann Arbor passed a resolution, offering to donate the sum of $20,000, in addition to her regular tax, upon condition that the county would vote $40,000, the whole to be used in the erection of a court-house. At the December meeting of the Board of Supervisors, in 1876, the Board passed a series of resolutions, setting forth that the court-house then in use had by reason of age and use become dilapidated, inconvenient, uncomfortable, unhealthy and unsafe for use; that the records and documents of the several county offices were exposed and liable to be destroyed by fire; that the Compiled Laws of the State (page 225, section 446) explicitly declare that each organized county should provide a suitable court-house; that the city of Ann Arbor, having generously offered to donate a large amount of the necessary sum, it was the opinion of the Board that the public interest and safety, and permanent preservation of the important records and documents of the several county offices demand the early erection of a new court-house, with fire-proof vaults attached to the offices of county clerk, register of deeds, judge of probate and county treasurer.

The question of authorizing a loan of $40,000 was submitted to the people at the spring election in 1877, and carried. Plans and specifications were then advertised for, and one furnished by G. W. Bunting, of Indianapolis, was adopted. The committee, appointed by the Board of Supervisors for that purpose, then advertised for sealed proposals for building, and on the 28th day of June, 1877, met at the old court-house, in Ann Arbor, to consider the proposals. Ten contractors made bids ranging from $56,879 to $73,500. The committee adopted the bid of McCormick & Sweaney, of Columbus, Indiana, on account of representations as to their responsibility and character as builders, though not the lowest by $21. The work was immediately commenced and rapidly pushed forward to completion.

LAYING THE CORNER-STONE.

The corner-stone was laid with imposing ceremonies at Ann Arbor, Thursday, Oct. 25, 1877. The day was very pleasant, and soon after seven o'clock people commenced to arrive, and continued so till time for the procession to move. The city of Ann Arbor was decked out with streamers extending from roof to sidewalk, and the stars and stripes floated proudly over many of the buildings. About 11 o'clock a procession was formed, and the number swelled by several hundred of the University students, which, after marching through several of the principal streets, halted at the northeast corner of the court-house, where the stand from which the speakers delivered their addresses was located.

Judge E. Lawrence, President of the day, opened the exercises by stating the object of the meeting, and then called upon the Ann Arbor band for a piece of music, after which the Rev. Dr. Cocker delivered a most impressive prayer.

President Lawrence then arose and said, that as he had been connected with the new building, he would make a few remarks pertaining thereto. He said he had been connected with the old court-house for 41 years, and had come to Washtenaw county when it contained but five towns, and had been identified with it ever since; that he considered it, physically, as an old county, and second to none in the Northwest, for which he felt proud. He referred to the many criticisms he had been subject to, as being the overseer of the work, and said that he used to think grumblers and fault-finders the meanest, most contemptible men on God Almighty's earth, but had become older and changed his mind, and considered that it was the searching criticisms of these men that caused the progress in civilization. They constantly found fault with everything, thus exposing the weak points when they are, from the pressure of such influences, constantly forced forward. He then alluded to the many trials he had been called upon to bear, and then said it was impossible to have made as solid a wall of stone as they did of brick, that where large boulders were placed, the tendency would be to crack the wall placed upon them; that the foundations of the ancient buildings, which had stood for 5,000 years, were of brick, and that this ought to be long enough to satisfy the most particular. In conclusion he said, that 40 years ago he had raised money by subscription to level the ground around the court-house, build a fence, and plant trees, but now was in favor of cutting them all down and having a smooth green with fountains at each corner of the building.

Col. Burleigh then read two letters, one from Governor Crosswell and one from Judge T. M. Cooley, regretting their inability to be present. He then read the contents of the box placed in the corner-stone, which is as follows:

The Ann Arbor Courier, Michigan Argus, Ann Arbor Register, Detroit Post and Tribune, the Detroit Free Press; Catalogue of Michigan University; Medical College announcement; Historical sketch of Michigan University; The Chronicle, No. 1, 1877; Medical and surgical announcement, 1877-'78; University Palladium, 1876; Catalogue of Museum of the University; The Michigan

THE OLD COURT HOUSE

Almanac, 1877; Circuit Court calendar, fall term, 1877; Catalogue of Michigan State Normal School; Proceedings of Board of Supervisors, 1876; Constitution, etc., of Ann Arbor Scientific Association; Catalogue of Ann Arbor public school; Proceedings of Michigan Publishers' Association; photographs of the old court-house; Programme of the day; large posters of the day; photographs of the workmen on the court-house; charter, etc., of Ann Arbor city; Constitution, etc., of Ann Arbor Schuetzenbund; Constitution, etc., of Ann Arbor Arbeiter Verein; poetry on the old court-house, by Mrs. Pierce; copy of the report of the court-house building committee; blank bond for the city of Ann Arbor for court-house; Michigan State Gazetteer.

After some music, Chauncey Joslin, the orator of the day, arose, and said he had never, in a life of 64 years, delivered but one oration, and that was when he was 16 years old, on the subject of "Universal Education and Universal Taxation," and that the sentiment it contained was so universally condemned, that he promised himself never to repeat it; that he had offered $5 to get out of the job, but his offer had been rejected. The many associations with which he was bound to the old court-house caused him to be sad instead of joyful upon this occasion. It was in the old court-house 40 years ago that he was legally born. He was admonished by the lapse of years that soon he would give place to younger men, which caused sober thoughts to pass through his mind. He contrasted the politicians of the early day with those then, much to the discredit of the latter. Formerly a man was elected to office because of his fitness, and he would commit political suicide did he solicit votes. He thought the jury box one of the best schools in which man could be placed to teach him human nature, and give him a knowledge of the world. Ex-Governor Felch then laid the cornerstone and dedicated it to justice and posterity, amid the ringing of the bells of the city and playing of the band.

The stone is located in the northeast corner of the building, and is inscribed with these words: "Erected in 1877."

Speeches were then made by Prof. Wells, of the law department, D. Cramer and J. Webster Childs, which concluded the ceremonies of the day.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BUILDING.

The new court-house is a handsome structure, 80x127 feet in size, and in the main part about 54 feet in height. In the center of the building is a tower which rises from the basement to a height of 152 feet. On each corner of the building is a small tower, between each of which is a figure of justice. The walls are of pressed red brick, two and a half feet thick, and are trimmed with stone, while the basement walls are of stone. The walls that support the towers are three feet in thickness. The roof is of slate and the cornices of iron, as are also the stairs. The entire building is fire-proof, and erected and furnished at a cost of $83,000. A large clock was placed in the tower, at a cost of $1,000. This clock was the gift of Luther James, for which the Board of Supervisors passed a vote of thanks. The liberality of Mr. James on this occasion will long be remembered by the citizens of the county.

The Second Jail Building.—The first jail was a rude affair, and was soon displaced by the present edifice. This building is situated on North Main street, about four blocks from the court-house. It is a brick structure, two stories and a half high, the front part of which is used for a dwelling by the jailor, and the rear divided into apartments and cells for the prisoners. It was erected in 1837, by John L. and Robert Davison, at a cost of $17,000. When erected it was considered a handsome building, in which the citizens felt a just pride, but almost a half century has passed away and it begins to show signs of age.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL.

Washtenaw county was represented for the first time in the Third Legislative Council, the first session of which convened at Detroit May 5, 1828, with an adjourned session July 3. The second session was held Sept. 7, 1829. Henry Rumsey, of Ann Arbor, was the first Representative.

James Kingsley was elected in 1830 and served as a member of the Fourth Council in 1830 and 1831.

In 1831 the Territory was divided into legislative districts, Washtenaw county comprising the fourth, being represented in the Fifth Council by James Kingsley and George Renwick.

The Sixth Council had as Representatives from Washtenaw George Renwick and Abel Millington.

CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTIONS.

The first Constitutional Convention held in this State was in 1835. It assembled at Detroit May 11, and adjourned June 24, after completing its labors. Washtenaw county was represented in this convention by Gilbert Shattuck, Abel Godard, William Moore, Robert Purdy, John Brewer, Alpheus Collins, Michael P. Stubbs, Richard Brower, Rufus Crossman, Nathaniel Noble, Russell Briggs, Orin How, Emanuel Case, Edward Mundy, Orrin White. It was this convention which formed the first Constitution of the State. The delegates were elected April 4, 1835, in pursuance of an act of the Territorial Council passed Jan. 26, 1835. The Constitution was adopted by a vote of the people in October, 1835, there being 6,299 yeas and 1,359 nays. It remained in force as the fundamental law of the State until the Constitution of 1850 went into operation.

FIRST CONVENTION OF ASSENT.

An act of Congress was passed June 15, 1836, cutting off Toledo and vicinity from the limits of Michigan and giving that territory to the State of Ohio. The admission of Michigan as one of the States of the Union was based upon her assent to this transfer. In pursuance of an act passed by the Legislature July 25, 1836, a Convention was called to take action in this matter. Election of delegates was held on the 12th of September, 1836, and met in Ann Arbor, Sept. 26, and adjourned Sept. 30, after refusing to consent to the transfer. Washtenaw county was represented in this Convention by Seth Markham, Michael P. Stubbs, Marcus Lane, Ebenezer H. Conklin, George P. Jefferies, Elnathan Noble, George W. Glover.

SECOND CONVENTION OF ASSENT.

The general desire for admission to the Union by the people of Michigan, caused many to be dissatisfied with the result of the convention held in December; therefore another convention was called which convened at Ann Arbor, Dec. 14, 1836, and adjourned the next day. The Detroit Advertiser, Dec. 16, 1836, says of this convention: "This voluntary assemblage of men 'in their original capacity,' organized at Ann Arbor on the 14th instant. They adopted a resolution giving what they called the assent of the State to the requisition of the act of June 15, and appointed a brace of special messengers to carry their proceedings to Washington." The records of this convention are not to be found in the office of the Secretary of State, it not being regarded by the State officers as a legal body, although by its action, and by its acceptance of the Congressional terms, Michigan was admitted as a State of the Union, Jan. 26, 1837, being given the northern peninsula in lieu of the southern boundary line heretofore claimed by the Territory and State of Michigan. Washtenaw county was represented in this convention by Nelson H. Wing, Samuel Champion, Jr., Nathaniel Noble, Lyman Downs, James Huston, Esek Pray, George W. Jewett, Solomon Sutherland, Samuel Denton, Samuel B. Bradley, Elisha Congdon, Stoddard W. Twitchell, Jesse Warner.

CONVENTION OF 1850.

This convention convened at Lansing June 3, 1850, and adjourned Aug. 15, after the formation of the present Constitution which was adopted, by a majority of 26,736. James Kingsley, Elias M. Skinner, Earls P. Gardiner, Daniel Hixson, Morgan O'Brien, William S. Carr and Benjamin W. Wait were representatives from this county.

CONVENTION OF 1867.

A convention was called and convened at Lansing May 15, 1867, to frame a new Constitution. This convention adjourned Aug. 22, after preparing a Constitution, which was submitted to a vote of the people and rejected by a vote of 71,733 yeas to 110,582 nays.

Thomas Ninde, Charles H. Richmond, Lyman D. Norris and Daniel Hixson represented Washtenaw county.

THE GERMAN ELEMENT.

The following is from the pen of Hon. Emanuel Mann, whose father was one of the first German settlers in the county:

“It was in the autumn of 1829 that Frederick Schilling, of Weinsberg, and Jonathan Henry Mann, of Stuttgart, in the kingdom of Würtemberg, in South Germany, crossed Lake Erie together in search of a new home in the Territory of Michigan. Schilling was accompanied by his family, consisting of wife, son and daughter. (Both son and daughter are still living at Sebawaing, Huron county.) J. H. Mann left his family at Reading, Pennsylvania, with a view to move in the following spring in case he found a desirable location in Michigan. They were advised by Daniel F. Allmendinger, also a native of Würtemberg, living near Dansville, New York, who had visited Michigan a short time before, to go to Washtenaw county, where said Allmendinger had already purchased Government land in the township of Lodi.

“As there was some good Government land in the ownship of Scio, Frederick Schilling purchased 80 acres on section— in said township. J. H. Mann, a tanner by trade, concluded to settle in the village of Ann Arbor, and to move his family the following spring.

“On his return to Pennsylvania, he wrote a letter to his brother-in-law, Emanuel Josenhans, in Stuttgart, giving a very favorable account of what he saw of the new Territory and the route by which it could be reached by immigrants from Germany, from New York via Erie Canal and Lake Erie. Mr. Josenhans circulated the letter amongst the peasantry in the neighborhood of Stuttgart. The consequence was that numerous immigration was started for Michigan by a class of small farmers and mechanics who had very limited means.

“J. Henry Mann with his family arrived at Ann Arbor in the first days of June, 1830, where he purchased a tannery of Harvey Austin. Said tannery was situated at or near where the present depot of the Toledo & Ann Arbor railroad is situated. During the following summer and fall the families of Jacob Paul, Jacob Stollsteimer, Carl Horming, Jacob Gross, Christian Auch and Daniel F. Allmendinger settled in Scio. George Mayle, a shoemaker, and Emanuel G. Wildt settled in Ann Arbor. In the winter of 1830 to 1831, Professor Gottlob Nordmann from Berlin, Prussia, arrived with his family. Mr. Nordmann, was Professor of Mathematics in a military academy and lost his place on account of his liberal political views. Mr. Nordmann moved in the spring of 1831 to Lima and became a farmer.

“During the year 1832, the following Germans arrived: William F. Orins, from the Granddutchy of Hesse, who immigrated to Pennsylvania in 1825, settled in Freedom. Mr. Orins was born March 21, 1797, served in the Germany army against the First Napoleon. He was for nine years Supervisor for the township of Freedom and Justice of the Peace for 20 years.

“John Schneeberger, John Hoberger, Thomas Roth, Jacob Haab, Jacob Haas and Martin Grauer settled in Freedom. Andrew Beck, with his sons, Jacob and Godfrey, David Luik, Frederick Staebler, Michael Haercher, Jacob April, Frederick Laubengaier and Ulrich Laubengaier, Johannes Stollsteimer, Jacob Wild, Conrad Bissinge, were some of the first settlers in Scio.

“In the summer of 1833, the Evangelical Mission Institute of Bale, Switzerland, sent Rev. Frederick Schmid as a missionary to the German Protestants in Michigan. A Church was organized and incorporated as the First German Evangelical Society of Scio. The first church building which the Germans in the Territory erected, was built by this society on an acre of land donated by Daniel F. Allmendinger for this purpose and as a burying ground. This building is still standing about two miles west of Ann Arbor, on the so-called territorial road.

“Rev. Frederick Schmid was for many years the only German Protestant minister in Michigan. He organized Churches in Detroit, Monroe and Waterloo in Jackson county.”

The foregoing were the pioneers of the German element, which now constitutes at least 30 per cent. of the population of Washtenaw county. In point of intelligence, in wealth, in all that goes to make up good citizens, those representing this nationality will compare favorably with others. In every station of life, as business or professional men, as office-holders, none bear a better reputation.

FIRST ENTRY.

The first entry of land in Washtenaw county was made July 1, 1822, by Eli Kellogg, and consisted of the south part of section 9, in township 3 south, of range 7 east, now lying within the city of Ypsilanti.

PEEP INTO WASHTENAW COUNTY.

A Detroit paper, March, 1842, contained the following:

This was the fifth county organized in the State. For agriculture, facilities for manufacturing, and beauty of country, it is not exceeded by any in the State. The soil is prolific, and is generally a deep, black and sandy loam and clay. Prairie, oak openings and heavy timbered lands are found alternately throughout the county.

The River Huron, which passes through the county, has sufficient fall to carry any amount of machinery. A competent engineer informs me that the whole distance of the river affords mill sites on every mile. Already there are 11 flour-mills, seven grist-mills and 31 saw-mills, one plaster-mill, one paper-mill, three fulling-mills, one woolen factory and two other buildings in the county, besides hydraulic power, used in various mechanical purposes.

In viewing the Huron and Raisin rivers, the thought arises, of what vast importance our water courses are, in producing riches to our State, if they were brought into requisition with the aid of machinery! But so long as the present policy of our Government in reference to home productions is persisted in, we cannot expect it to be used. Let us have a discriminating tariff, and before five years passes away, the streams of Michigan would be dotted with manufacturing villages.

This county contains 460,800 acres, or 720 square miles. The valuation in 1837 was $1,688,487. In 1840 it had increased to $2,735,401.10. Owing to the excellence of the soil, it early attracted the universal admiration of the settler, and before the speculating fever of 1836 came on, the land in the county was mostly in the hand of the actual settler, or those who intended to make it their future home. Accordingly we find that eight years after it was organized, 1834, the population amounted to 14,920. In 1837 it had reached 16,176, and at the census of 1840 it stood at 23,571, being the second county in the State as to population.

As curiosity is always on tip-toe to know the particulars as to the ages of the inhabitants of a county, especially a new one, which dates but 15 years back. I subjoin the following from the last United States census:

Males.	Females.

Here, then, we have 5,932 males above the age of 20 years in the county. Now let us look a little to their industry and see what they are all doing.

By the recent census, we find them classed as follows :

Engaged in agriculture.....	4,682
“ commerce.....	101
“ manufactures and trade.....	998
“ navigating the lakes.....	13
“ learned professions.....	117
Insane.....	5

Total.....	5,935

Engaged in agriculture, 4,682. What have they done? Let us see. The first column will show the products, as appears by the State census of 1837. The second, the United States census of 1840, but gives the products of 1839. The third column, the increase in two years.

“ oats.....	203,874	284,181	80,035

It will be seen that in 1837 they produced 261,866 bushels of breadstuffs, and two years afterward, 1839, they raised 486,896 bushels, being an increase of 226,130 bushels. It is a fair calculation, then, to put them down for last year, 600,000 bushels, or one hundred and fifty bushels to each inhabitant over 20 years of age engaged in agriculture, besides 284,181 bushels of oats.

FARM STOCK.

In farm stock, the county shows a good front, and far excels any other in the State. The dairies, as you may say, have just commenced; but the amount sold last year is estimated to have reached one hundred thousand dollars. To show you the rapid increase of stock, I give you the result of the two last censuses:

	1837.	1839.	In 2 y'rs.
Cattle.....	15,772	24,208	6,436

Swine.....	16,640	30,141	13,505
Total.....	39,560	75,241	36,691

It may be estimated there are now over 100,000 head of stock in the county. Great attention is now given to wool growing. The fleece of 1839, was 20,472 pounds. This year, it will reach near 70,000 pounds, as thousands of excellent sheep were driven into the county the past two seasons.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The great attention given to stock has originated through the exertions of their agricultural society, which was organized three years since, and has already produced much good in stimulating each other to honorable emulation.

The farmers owe much to the laudable exertions of their Secretary, William S. Maynard, Esq., for its present flourishing condition. I learn it has some 400 members, and is composed of the most public-spirited and enterprising members of the county. Their exhibitions at the last fair were an honor to the State, and should receive, as well as all other similar societies in our State, aid from the Legislature. Ours is strictly an agricultural State, and the farmers pay nine-tenths of the taxes. But as yet, not a single act has ever been passed to encourage the development of agriculture, while thousands have been squandered on worthless projects.

NURSERIES AND GARDENS.

There are two in the county, and have $15,000 capital invested in them. The sales last year amounted to near $5,000, and there are five persons employed in them. Both establishments have greenhouses attached to them. The one at Ann Arbor is owned by Mr. Noble, and comprises a great variety of enticing plants. Large quantities of garden and flower seeds are put up by him annually. The other is located at Ypsilanti, and the Messrs. Lay are the proprietors. This establishment comprises about 14 acres, and includes all kinds of trees and plants, raising 300,000. The proprietor handed me a catalogue of his establishment, and a great variety of fruit trees is to be found, viz.: Of apples, 162 kinds; of pears, 180; of peaches, 43; of cherries, 33; of plums, 30; of quinces, 6.

Speaking of nurseries reminds me of the great negligence of our farmers in setting out orchards. There is no equal amount of labor and expense that contributes more liberally to the pleasure and profits of the husbandman and his family, than that expended in the establishment and culture of a good fruit garden. Why is its culture so much neglected?

An acre of ground will very conveniently accommodate 100 trees, and can be had at the nurseries for $20; the cost of setting them will not exceed $10, and the land, $10. Total, $40. The annual interest on this outlay is but $2.80. Allowing eight years for the trees to come into bearing after being set out in the orchard, the interest would be $22.40, which, added to the above $40, would make the orchard in bearing order at only $62.40, to say nothing of the profits of the grain that might be raised during the eight years on the land. The produce of the orchard would be from three to ten bushels to a tree; but put it at six bushels, or 600 bushels for the orchard of 100 trees, call the apples only 10 cents a bushel, and how would the account stand?

Orchard, debtor.	Orchard, creditor. or paying an annual interest of near 100 per cent. Now I ask, what other way could this amount of money and labor applied in farming operations secure so large a profit on each acre of land employed? If the farmer wishes a variety of fruit, and that which will give him still more profit for an acre, let him set out the following:

15 Cherry.	10 Peach.
10 Pear.	15 Early Apple.
12 Plum.	20 Winter Apple.
8 Apricot.	10 Quince.

MANUFACTURES AND TRADES.

As we before noticed, the persons engaged in this county in manufactures and trades are 998. Perhaps it may be as well, if you have patience, to peep into their business as it was at the recent census.

STORES.—There are 85 stores in the county, and the capital invested is $249,325. Eighty-five stores must give employment on an average of two persons to each. Total persons employed, 170.

FURNACES.—There are four cast-iron furnaces; 33 men employed; capital invested, $9,000.

BRICK-YARD AND LIME-KILNS.—Several of them. The capital invested, $14,220; give employment to 62 men, and produced in value $11,685.

HAT MANUFACTORIES.—Four establishments. Capital invested, $5,650; employ 31 persons, and produces in value $8,600.

TANNERIES.—Four in operation; capital employed, $4,800; persons engaged in them, seven; sides of leather tanned, 60+. All other manufactures of leather, 11; capital invested, $20,100. Value produced, $38,500.

Total capital in manufactures, $314,555.

FLOUR MILLS.—Eleven; amount of flour made, 62,000 barrels; grist-mills, seven; saw-mills, 41; capital invested in mills, $220,000; value of their products, $351,520.

RECAPITULATION.

Capital invested in manufactures,	$314,555
“ “ “ mills	220,000

Total	$783,870

Here, then, in this new county, is over three quarters of a million of dollars, invested in various branches of industry. The persons engaged in them number about 1,000, and most of them have families of persons depending upon them for support; which at four each, amount to 5,000, which constitutes a home market for the farmers to supply.

Ours is a grain-growing State. But who wants our products? England prohibits it from her shores, unless we pay her 75 cents for every bushel of our grain that enters her ports, and at the same time thousands are starving for it; France won't receive it; Germany don't want it. Out of the 85,000,000 bushels raised in the United States last year, England took but 3,000,000 of us, and only 7,000,000 went to all foreign countries. Thus it is seen that nearly all our annual production is consumed at home. But who are the consumers of the surplus consumed by the grain-growers themselves? Of course they are those persons not engaged in grain-growing, but in manufacturing and mechanical business. The more persons, therefore, engaged in the pursuits, the better will be the market afforded to the farmer. It is the farmer and wool-grower that are most deeply interested in the prosperity and growth of American industry.

The Southerners tell us it is better for the farmer to advocate free trade. Let us see. Beef costs in South America less than half a cent a pound. In New York it is generally worth six to eight cents. If the duty is taken off as the free-traders wish it, a yoke of cattle in Michigan weighing 2,000 pounds would be worth $10 for the beef.

With a protective tariff, the farmer will have a home market in his own country. Free trade will compel him to compete, not only with the South American beef, but every product he raises will be in the same situation. As, for instance, wheat can be purchased at Odessa, in the south of Russia, for 12 cents a bushel, and freighted here at 10 cents, and sold in the Eastern market for 28 cents, which is less than it can be raised for in this country.

PAPER VILLAGES.

Washtenaw county, like many other counties in the State and nation, has had within her boundaries villages conceived but never born. Plats have been made and recorded; lithographic views have been printed of places that in time were to be "future great" cities. Alas for the hopes of man! In some of these villages enough lots were not sold to pay the recorder's fee, to say nothing of the surveyor and lithographer. Among the paper villages of Washtenaw will be found the following:

Barton.—This beautiful village was laid out in 1837, by Charles Tull, Philip Brigham, Alonzo Platt. It was located on section 17, Ann Arbor township, about one mile above the city of Ann Arbor, on the Huron river. One lone house yet remains upon the village plat.

Sharon.—Platted in 1836, by N. Ambrose, E. Walker and Luke Gilbert. Located in Sharon township.

Tubal C. Owen

Saratoga of Michigan.—In 1836 a magnificent village was laid out on parts of sections 1 and 12, Dexter township, on what is known as Portage Lake, by G. R. Lillibridge. Old settlers report that a splendid lithographic map of the village was made, in which fine steamers plowed the lake, and everything else was shown on a grand scale. The streets of the village were named after the great poets, novelists and musicians of the world. Dryden, Byron, Shakespeare, Burns, Bulwer, Haydn, Mozart and others were represented. But all efforts to induce settlers here were unavailing.

Windham.—This village was located on Iron Lake, Manchester township, and was platted by George Byrns, in 1836.

Harford.—Charles and Sophronia Harford platted a village in Lima township, in 1835, which met with the same fate of Saratoga, Boston and others.

CHAPTER XIV.

WASHTENAW COUNTY IN THE WAR.

The Presidential election in 1860 resulting in the choice of Abraham Lincoln for the Presidency becoming known, 11 States of the Union, in rapid succession, passed acts of secession, and at once arrayed themselves in open hostility to the general Government. On the 12th day of April, 1861, the rebel forces, under command of Gen. P. T. Beauregard, opened fire on Fort Sumter, and for two days and nights it was maintained, until at last Major Anderson, as brave and gallant a soldier as ever drew a sword in defense of his country, was compelled to lower the American flag and surrender his forces to the rebels who were seeking to destroy the Union. When this outrage was committed every loyal heart in the North was fired and a cry for redress went up; therefore, when Abraham Lincoln issued his first proclamation calling for 75,000 men, he found the people not only ready but eager to wipe out the stain upon the nation's flag. To indicate something of the feeling and spirit of the people as reflected by its papers, the following extract is taken from a local paper printed but a few days after the surrender of the fort and the issuance of the proclamation of the President:

“Like the viper which was warmed to life in the bosom of the countryman and then stung him to death, so the cotton States of the Union have raised the parricidal hand of bloody war against the Government which has long fostered and protected them. History will blush to record the hugeness of the crime. It overtops the ordinary criminality of causeless, aggressive warfare, as Satan exceeded in proportions the other rebel angels.

‘He above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
Stood like a tower; * * * *

but his face
Deep scars of thunder had entrenched, and care
Sat on his faded cheek.’

“Without a parallel in the history of the world, all other rebellions, all other treasons, will dwindle to insignificance before the enormity and wickedness of the present. The loyal States and the general Government have given an example of patience and forbearance which was fast being regarded as weakness and imbecility. But, thank God, there is a change. The Government still has power. She struggled long to avert a war, but it has been at last forced upon her. Now she will test her power and prove too strong for treason. There are loyal men enough to defend the Union against every foe. The old Jackson spirit still lives and is intensified seven-fold. 'The Union must and shall be preserved.' We love the old Union more and more every day. The star-spangled banner creates sensations never felt before. Men of all parties feel that no other banner shall ever float over us. The cursed rattlesnake banner has no business on American soil, and by the blessings of God it shall be driven back to the hell from which it came. The descendants of the pilgrims will never disgrace their ancestry. The clouds will scatter, day will dawn, and out of the thick gloom of the present, liberty will come forth arrayed in robes of rejoicing, and enter upon new glories, 'heights unattempted yet in prose or rhyme.'

' — The land

Is never lost that has a son to right her,
And here are troops of sons, and loyal ones.
Strong in her children should a mother be ;
Shall ours be helpless, that has sons like us?"

With feelings like these gushing from every heart, it is no wonder that her able-bodied sons sprang to arms, and interposed "fortune, life and sacred honor" in defense of the country. In this noble work the sons of Washtenaw county were behind no others in self-sacrifice. The call was no sooner flashed over the wires than a company was formed at Ann Arbor, becoming part of the First Regiment of Michigan Volunteers. They at once marched to the front, served out their time of three months, returned and re-enlisted again for three years or during the war.

At every call from the President responses were made, and no county in the State shows a better record than Washtenaw. About 4,000 brave men went forth to battle, 450 of whom never returned—their lives being offered as a sacrifice upon their country's altar. On nearly every battle-field in the South, at Bull Run, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania, Gettysburg, Antietam and other equally renowned conflicts they fell, and always "with their faces to the foe." Many of those who at the close of the war did return, may daily be seen, some with empty sleeves, some with wooden legs, and others with marks disfiguring them for life, but all happy with the thought that their loss was their country's gain.

Short sketches of the various regiments in which any considerable number of men were from Washtenaw county, as well as a list of volunteers compiled from the Adjutant General's report, are here appended:

FIRST INFANTRY FOR THREE MONTHS.

FIRST INFANTRY FOR THREE YEARS.

This was organized soon after the discharge of the preceding, and left the State Sept. 16, 1861, numbering in officers and men 950. Twenty-seven recruits were subsequently added. The regiment was equipped at Annapolis Junction the following winter, and guarded the Baltimore & Washington railroad. In March, 1862, it moved to the Peninsula, and afterward participated in the engagements at Mechanicsville, Bull Run, Antietam, Fredericksburg, etc. At Bull Run it lost its Colonel (Roberts) and 28 other men, and about half the remainder were wounded. Losses were sustained also in all the other engagements.

After a severe and prolonged march, it reached Gettysburg, July 2, where it entered that bloody contest with 20 officers and 125 men, and suffered a loss of five killed and 21 wounded. It afterward aided in chasing the rebels through Manassas Gap, and went into camp at Warrenton. After several minor engagements and various services in the spring of 1863, it enjoyed a 30 days' furlough at home, rendezvousing at Coldwater. It engaged in the campaign of 1864, with the army of the Potomac, and it is said that it was the first to attack the enemy in this campaign. The loss was severe. In June it was engaged in constructing fortifications, and in the trenches before Petersburg, and subsequently did valiant and efficient service in the battle at that point, carrying at one time, unaided and alone, two strong fortifications of the enemy, and a portion of the line of works.

From this time to the close of the war, it was busy in guard duty, skirmishes, etc.; was in action at the battle of Appomattox court-house, where Lee surrendered and the war closed. Was mustered out of service July 9, 1865, at Jeffersonville, Ind. Total losses: Died in action or of wounds, 158; died of disease, 55; wounded, 345; taken prisoners, 77.

Humphrey, Sergeant-Major to Second and First Lieut.; Alonzo Shumway, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut., Captain; Carlos N. Webb, private to Second and First Lieut.

This regiment left Kalamazoo, Mich., for Virginia, Aug. 30, 1861, its muster-roll showing 944 officers and enlisted men, which by July 1, 1862, was increased to 1,075. It was in camp in Baltimore during most of the winter, sailed thence for Ship Island, Miss., and thence, April 14, 1862, embarked for New Orleans, being one of the first regiments to occupy the city after its capture by the Union forces. May 15 it proceeded up the Mississippi river as far as Warrenton, landing on the route at different points to aid in the destruction of the enemy's works and communications, and returned to Baton Rouge June 5. It bore an active part in the battle of Baton Rouge, Aug. 5. After the evacuation of the Union forces Aug. 20, 1862, the Sixth Infantry was stationed at Metairie Ridge, guarding one of the approaches to New Orleans. Owing to the unhealthy locality in which the regiment was stationed, the number fit for duty when it moved to New Orleans, Dec. 6, was only 191 out of an aggregate of 755. The men soon recovered after their arrival at the latter place. Jan. 14, 1863, it participated in the expedition under General Weitzel, to Bayou Tesche, which destroyed the rebel gunboat, Cotton. Was stationed, Feb. 6, in the advance at Camp Parapet, and at Renner, 18 miles from New Orleans. May 12 it made a raid up the Jackson railroad, destroying the enemy's camp at Tangissaho, capturing 60 prisoners and burning a large gun-carriage factory, a shoe factory, and a tannery used by the rebel authorities; the value of this property was upward of $400,000. The loss of the regiment was one wounded; it arrived at Port Hudson on the 23d, where it remained until the surrender of the place, July 9. It participated in the assaults on the 27th of May and the 14th of June. In the first one it lost more than one-third of its men engaged. An order of Major-General Banks, issued from headquarters of the Department of the Gulf, July 10, converted this regiment "into a regiment of heavy artillery, to retain, until otherwise officially designated, its infantry number, and to have the organization, pay, clothing and equipment prescribed by law, and regulations for troops of the artillery army." Enjoyed a 30-day furlough in the spring of 1864, rendezvousing at Kalamazoo; returned to Port Hudson with recruits; was at Morganzia for several periods, during the last being employed as engineers; did duty again as heavy artillery; was present at the bombardment and surrender of Fort Morgan, Ala.; assisted Gens. Gordon Granger and Bertram in operations against Mobile and along the Gulf; aided in taking Spanish Fort; reported to Sheridan at New Orleans July 11; and Sept. 5 was paid off and disbanded at Detroit. Casualties: Died in action or of wounds, 58; of disease, 374; wounded in action, 82; taken prisoners, 18; total, 532. The regiment participated in 21 battles and skirmishes.

The following promotions were made: William A. Brown, from Second to First Lieut.; William A. Clark, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut.; Erastus M. Gilbert, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut.

This regiment moved from Detroit, Sept. 27, 1861, with an aggregate force of 915, to which 84 recruits were subsequently added. October 19, at Annapolis, it embarked as part of expedition to Hilton Head, S. C., under Gen. Sherman; took part in engagements at Hilton Head, Port Royal Ferry, Fort Pulaski, Wilmington Island, James Island, Bull Run, Chantilly, South Mountain and Antietam. Late in the autumn it was engaged in provost duty at Falmouth; was in the battle of Fredericksburg; moved to Newport News, Feb. 13, 1862, and in March, to Lebanon, Ky.; in June, to Vicksburg; in engagements toward Jackson, Miss., during July; arrived at Knoxville, Tenn., Sept. 20, and at Loudon, Oct. 29. Up to Nov. 1, 1863, the regiment had traveled by rail, foot and otherwise nearly 5,000 miles.

The Eighth skirmished around until January, 1864, when it re-enlisted as veterans, and returned home on a furlough of 30 days, rendezvousing at Flint. Having received a large number of recruits, it went to Annapolis, Md.; in May, it commenced the campaign with the Army of the Potomac; participated in the battle of the Wilderness, losing 99 killed, wounded and missing; in the battle of Chancellorsville it lost 49; at Grove Church, 52; by a forced march reached Petersburg, June 16, where it took part in action, losing 49 men; continued in active service during the summer, with casualties almost daily; put the enemy to flight from the Weldon Railroad, but with a loss of 30 men. The following autumn and winter were spent in erecting fortifications, guarding posts, etc.; drove the enemy from Fort Mahon, April 2, 1865, and was probably the first to plant its colors over the works at that point. Was mustered out of service, July 30, and arrived at Detroit, Aug. 3, where it was paid off and discharged.

James V. Henry was promoted from Sergeant to First Lieut.

The Ninth Infantry left Detroit for Kentucky Oct. 25, 1861, the first regiment from Michigan to enter upon active service in the Western Departments. Its muster-in-roll exhibited a force of 913, and 73 more were added before July 1, 1862. The regiment suffered largely from sickness almost immediately upon its going into service. It formed part of the force under Gen. Negley, which made a demonstration on Chattanooga, in June, 1862, and July 13 four companies, under command of its Major, being at Tullahoma, the remaining six companies, with other troops, were attacked by a large hostile force at Murfreesboro, Tenn., and after a sharp struggle, taken prisoners, with a loss of 13 killed and 78 wounded. The wounded officers and the enlisted men were at once paroled, and a few months afterward were exchanged. The remainder of the regiment with the officers and headquarters was established at Nashville, Tenn. It also participated in the battle of Murfreesboro Dec. 31, 1862, and collected several regiments which had broken during that struggle. At the battle of Chickamauga it performed a similar duty. In December, the regiment, to the number of 229, re-enlisted as a Veteran organization. The regiment was then ordered to Coldwater, Mich., and upon arrival there Jan. 5, 1865, was furloughed for 30 days. It re-assembled at the same place, when it received recruits. Leaving Coldwater Feb. 20, with about 500 men, the regiment returned to Chattanooga, and was attached to the headquarters of the Department of the Cumberland. May 3 the Ninth marched from Chattanooga, with the headquarters of the Army of the Cumberland, and participated, with that army, in the campaign in Georgia, being present at the actions of Rocky Face Ridge, Resaca, Dallas, Kenesaw Mountain, and the other engagements of the campaign preceding and including the siege of Atlanta. It also accompanied the army around Atlanta to Jonesboro, and aided in destroying the railroad to that place, and in the performance of other duties. It entered Atlanta on its evacuation by the rebel army, and was engaged in provost duty until that city was evacuated by our forces. The regiment then returned to Chattanooga. It remained at Chattanooga doing guard duty at the headquarters of the Army of the Cumberland, also picket duty for that post, until March 27, 1865; when Gen. Thomas removed his headquarters to Nashville, it was ordered to that point, and on the 24th arrived there by rail, and was assigned to duty guarding the military prison, and also at Gen. Thomas's headquarters. The regiment continued at Nashville, performing the same general service until Sept. 15, when it was mustered out, and the day following left for Michigan, arriving at Jackson on the 19th, and on the 26th and 27th was paid off and disbanded. This regiment participated in 12 battles and skirmishes during the service. Its losses during this time were: Died in action or of wounds received, 30; died of disease, 61; wounded in action, 78; taken prisoners, about 500; total, 669.

This regiment moved from White Pigeon, Mich., its rendezvous, Dec. 9, 1861, with a force of 1,004 men, which was increased by 77 before July 1, 1862. It was stationed during the winter of 1861-'2 at Bardstown, Ky., where it suffered severely from sickness, and for the first year performed all its service in Kentucky and Tennessee. In August it aided in the repulse of Morgan's guerrillas at Gallatin, Tenn.; afterward it was stationed at Nashville, at or near which place it remained during November and December, until the army under Gen. Rosecrans moved forward late in the latter month. Was warmly engaged at Stoue river, losing 32 killed, 79 wounded and 29 missing, a total of 140; was detached to act as Provost Guard at Murfreesboro, until the advance on Tullahoma, in June; it remained in camp at Decherd, Tenn., until the advance into Georgia Sept. 1. The march over the mountains was accomplished under great difficulties, and at a test of great endurance on the part of the troops. The regiment was in the fiercest of the fight at Chickamauga, and suffered a loss of seven killed, 76 wounded and 23 missing; total, 106. November 1, it was stationed at Chattanooga. At the battle of Mission Ridge, Nov. 25, 1863, the Eleventh participated in the decisive charge, and was one of the first to reach the enemy's works. Its loss in this action was six killed and 33 wounded. May 7, it entered upon the Georgia campaign under Gen. Sherman. It participated in the engagement with the enemy on the 14th, at Resaca, and on the 27th, at New Hope Church. It remained at the last named place eight days, holding an exposed position, and almost constantly under fire. During the month the loss of the regiment was four killed and eight wounded. The enemy having evacuated his works at New Hope Church, and retreated to Kenesaw Mountain, the regiment assisted in the pursuit to that point. It was here frequently engaged in skirmishing, and under a heavy artillery fire. The loss of the regiment in the month of June was two killed and 57 wounded. The enemy left their position at Kenesaw Mountain and the regiment moved in brisk pursuit, overtaking them at Rough's Station; participated in the successful charge on the first line of the enemy's works, losing three killed and 10 wounded; engaged in the battle of Peach Tree Creek, July 20, where it sustained a loss of two killed and nine wounded. It was also present at the battle of Aug. 7, and participated in a charge on the enemy's fortifications in front of Atlanta. The casualties in the regiment in this action were 15 killed and 15 wounded. The period for which the regiment enlisted having expired, it was ordered to Chattanooga Aug. 27. The rebel General, Wheeler, being engaged in making a raid into Tennessee, the regiment, immediately after its arrival at Chattanooga, on the 30th, was ordered to join the column in pursuit, and march to Murfreesboro, and thence to Huntsville, Ala., but without meeting the enemy. It returned to Chatta-

This regiment left its rendezvous at Kalamazoo Feb. 12, 1862, 925 strong. Enlistments previous to July 1 added 74 to its number. Its route was through Kentucky and Tennessee, via Bowling Green and Nashville. It reached the battle-field at Pittsburg Landing, after a forced march, near the close of the second day's fight, and thence forward until the evacuation of Corinth; was engaged in picket and fatigue duty with the force that captured that post. The Thirteenth was the last of Gen. Buell's command to leave Northeastern Alabama, on the withdrawal of our forces from that region in August, and was among the troops of the same army which fell back upon Louisville. It joined in the pursuit of Bragg's army in October, and was afterward stationed near Silver Springs, Tenn., and marched with the army under Gen. Rosecrans on Murfreesboro. It was deployed as skirmishers, on the 29th, in the advance, and suffered some loss. It participated in the bloody engagement at Stone River, going into action with 244 muskets, and losing out of this number 25 killed or died of wounds, 62 wounded and eight missing. Dec. 31 it re-captured, by a bayonet charge, two guns which had fallen into the hands of the enemy. After the occupation of Murfreesboro, the regiment was engaged in building fortifications, etc., and went into camp at Hillsboro. Aug. 16 the army advanced into Georgia. The Division having crossed the Tennessee river at Shell Mound, moved on Chattanooga, and on the morning of the 8th of September that town was taken, the Thirteenth being among the first to enter the city. It participated in the engagement of September at Chickamauga, when, going into action with 217 officers and men, it lost in killed, 14; wounded 68 (of whom 11 died), and 25 missing; total loss, 107.

Participated in the battle of Chattanooga (or Mission Ridge). During the months of December and January, it was stationed on the Chickamauga, engaged in picket duty and cutting logs for building warehouses at Chattanooga. Having re-enlisted as a veteran regiment Jan. 17, 1864, it received orders Feb. 5 to proceed to Michigan, and on the 12th arrived at Kalamazoo. Its members here received a furlough of 30 days.

Having received, while in the State, over 400 recruits, it arrived at Chattanooga April 20, and until Sept. 25 it was stationed on Lookout Mountain, engaged in the construction of military hospitals. Participated in the pursuit of the rebels under Forrest and Roddy, in North Alabama. Returning to Chattanooga Oct. 17, it remained there a few days, and thence proceeded to join its brigade, which it reached at Rome, Georgia, Nov. 1, 1864. On the 3d it was at Tilton, when it received orders to proceed to Rome, where it remained until the 7th, when it joined the army of General Sherman at Kingston, and formed a part of the general army that "marched down to the sea." The regiment with its brigade, reached Savannah the 16th, and was in the trenches before that city until the 21st, when the enemy evacuated the place. Jan. 17, 1865, the regiment moved forward with the army on the march through the Carolinas, and was engaged at Catawba river, S. C., Feb. 29, and at Averysboro, N. C., March 16, and again at Bentonville on the 19th, where it fought the enemy the entire day, sustaining a loss of 110 killed, wounded and missing. Among the killed was its commanding officer, Col. W. G. Eaton. Pending the negotiations attending the surrender of Johnston's army, the regiment was stationed on the Cape Fear river, 26 miles south of Raleigh, and on April 30 it started with the army homeward, reaching Washington, D. C., on the 19th, and on the 24th participated in the grand review of Gen. Sherman's army at the national capital.

It was mustered out of service July 25, and on the 27th arrived at Jackson, Mich., when it was paid off and disbanded. The losses sustained by the regiment during the service were: Died in action or of wounds, 53; died of disease, 175; wounded in action, 99; taken prisoners, 46; total, 373.

Jan. 3, 1863, it participated in the battle of Stone River, having marched 30 miles through rain and mud the previous night; afterward guarded Franklin, Tenn., for a time. In September it was mounted as cavalry, and in a few months it had captured 12 rebel officers, 285 enlisted men and 85 guerillas. It made its headquarters at Columbia, Tenn., and while there, a loyal sentiment grew up, the country was cleared of guerillas, and signs of permanent peace in that section appeared. It guarded railroads, built fortifications, and for miles around captured rebel officers and soldiers. Jan. 4, 1864, the Thirteenth re-enlisted as veterans, and received the usual 30-day furlough. Returned to Nashville in May; joined Gen. Sherman and fought until the fall of Atlanta; was engaged at Kenesaw Mountain; drove the rebels from their rifle-pits in July, at the Chattahoochie River engagement, capturing a number of prisoners, with a loss of nine killed and 35 wounded; repeated its victories the next month, and continued the good work until November, when it reach Savannah in the grand march; was present at Johnston's surrender; participated in the grand review at Washington, was mustered out of service July 18, 1865, at Louisville, Ky., and was paid off and discharged at Jackson, Mich., the 29th. Companies A, B, D, E, F, H, I and K, of this regiment, were represented from Washtenaw county. This regiment, originally known as Stockton's Independent Regiment, went into the field Sept. 16, 1861. Encamped during the winter at Hall's Hill, Virginia, and was in the Peninsular campaign, under Gen. McClellan, in March; shared in the siege of Yorktown in April, and participated in the battles at Hanover Court-House, May 27; at Gaines' Mills, June 27, and at Malvern Hill, July 1. It joined Pope's army at Fredericksburg, fought at Bull Run, Aug. 30, and at Antietam, Sept. 17. It also participated in the action at Fredericksburg, Dec. 13 and 14. The regiment crossed the Rappahannock and Rapidan rivers, and engaged in the battle of Chancellorsville, May 2-5. It participated in the battle of Middleburg, and from there, by a series of forced marches, reached Gettysburg, and engaged in that battle, with a total loss of 79 men. It joined in the pursuit of the enemy, and was present at the battle of Wapping Heights, though not actively engaged. It engaged in skirmishing at the action of Brandy Heights. It then fell back to Abum, and remained there till Nov. 7. In the first year the regiment marched about 800 miles. Nov. 7 it again started, and participated in the movement across the Rapidan to Mine Run, serving as guard to the wagon train. Having re-enlisted, the regiment was again mustered into service Dec. 24, and Jan. 2, 1864, it left for Michigan on a 30-days' furlough. Arriving in the field again, May 1, it started on the great campaign of the year. On the 6th and 7th it participated in the battle of the Wilderness. For about a month it was engaged in the trenches in front of Petersburg; it followed Lee's army, and was engaged at Amelia Court-House, High Bridge, Appomattox Court-House, where Lee surrendered, and from there to Sutherland Station. It then passed on to Washington and participated in the grand review of the Army of the Potomac. It then wound around through Maryland, Kentucky, and down into Mississippi. It erected fortifications at Milldale, and engaged in several skirmishes near Jackson.

It came back to Kentucky, thence into East Tennessee, with the army of the Ohio, in September and October, 1863. It then passed from Knoxville, via London to Lenoir, and then joined the army opposing the advance of Longstreet on Knoxville. From Spottsylvania Court-House it moved toward Petersburg, and was in the siege at that point. Then it passed on to other places, and finally to Appomattox river, where it remained during the winter. In March it again started, and moved back to Petersburg and remained in or near there till April 24, when it left. It arrived at Alexandria the 27th. On the 29th, it departed for Washington, D. C., and there participated in the grand review of the army of the Potomac. From there it went to Tannally Town, Virginia, where it was mustered out of service June 3. It then started for Michigan, reaching Detroit on the 7th, and was there paid off and discharged. This regiment left its rendezvous at Marshall Dec. 17, 1861, for Louisville, with an aggregate force of 1,032. The first service performed by the regiment was mostly done by detachments. One of these detachments, under Gen. O. M. Mitchell, comprised the first Union troops to enter Bowling Green, after its evacuation by the enemy. The regiment was mostly engaged in the repair or reopening of railroads between some of the principal points in Kentucky and Tennessee. On Jan. 1, 1863, the regiment was attacked at Lavergne, by a large cavalry force of the enemy numbering about 3,500 men. The rebels were defeated with considerable loss, while the regiment lost only one killed and six wounded. During the greater part of this year, the regiment was engaged in building bridges on the railroads in the South. The regiment was stationed at Elk River bridge, Oct. 31. In March and April a portion of the regiment was engaged in running saw-mills, getting out railroad ties and building hospital accommodations. In June, July, August and September the regiment, with the exception of two companies, were engaged on the line of the Atlanta & Western railroad, building, repairing, etc., with headquarters at Atlanta, Georgia. The regiment during this time did not perform much fighting, but did a great amount of work of much value to the armies with which it had been connected. It re-enlisted as a veteran regiment on Oct. 31, 1864, and on Nov. 16, it formed a part of the engineer force of the 20th and 17th Army Corps, when "Sherman marched down to the sea." In Savannah, the regiment constructed some fine lines of works. It then went to Goldboro, via Beaufort, thence to Raleigh, and from there proceeded to Washington, via Petersburg, Richmond and Alexandria. It participated in the review at the city of Washington, and then encamped near Georgetown, D. C. In June it went to Louisville, and from there to Nashville, where it was mustered out of service Sept. 22d, arriving at Jackson Sept. 25, and Oct. 1 was paid off and discharged. The regiment saw but nine battles, not being connected with the fighting force of the armies. The total losses were: Died in action or of wounds received, eight; died of disease, 245; wounded in action, 17; taken prisoners, 15; total, 285.

The Fourth Regiment was authorized to be organized about July 1, 1862, and the organization being completed, it left Detroit on the 26th of Sept. and started for Louisville, Kentucky. The regiment led the advance in the attack against Morgan, and at Lebanon, Kentucky, captured a large amount of commissary stores and clothing. The Fourth played terrible havoc with the enemy at Franklin, Tenn., in Dec. 1862. It had several sharp skirmishes during the winter with the enemy, while stationed in Tennessee. On May 22, 1863, the Fourth, with other Michigan troops, attacked and routed the enemy, taking 55 prisoners, and the colors of the 1st Alabama (rebel) regiment. During this year (1863) the regiment was engaged in skirmishing throughout the States of Tennessee and Alabama. The regiment then joined the army under Gen. Sherman, and moving with that force, did splendid service in destroying bridges, arms and ammunition belonging to the rebels. During 1864, the regiment was almost continually engaged with Wheelers' Cavalry, and on Sept. 17 a corporal and 17 men being in a block house, were attacked by Wheeler with 8,000 men, and artillery. Although the enemy shelled the block house for over five hours, they could not force a surrender, and finally retired with a loss of eight killed and 60 wounded. The Corporal was promoted, and the men honorably mentioned in general orders. This regiment will long be remembered by the loyal people of this country, as a detachment of the Fourth captured the Confederate President, Jefferson Davis. The following are some of the facts connected with the capture. On May 7, 1865, Lieut.-Colonel Pritchard was directed by Colonel Minty to proceed with the Fourth Regiment as rapidly as possible to Spaulding, Irwin county, North Carolina, and picket the Ocmulgee river from Hawkinsville to the mouth of the Oconee river, for preventing the escape of Jefferson Davis, who was then supposed to be making his way to the Atlantic coast, and if he got on his track to follow him wherever he went, and to capture or kill him without fail. At Abbeville, Pritchard became satisfied that Davis had already crossed the Ocmulgee, and ascertained that the 1st Wisconsin Cavalry was following him closely in the direction of Irwinsville. With 153 of the best mounted men of the regiment he followed the line of the Ocmulgee for some miles, and then took a bridle path, or blind road, through the woods toward Irwinsville, and arrived at that place about 2 o'clock A. M., on the 10th, and found that Davis had not yet passed. Pretending to be a part of his escort, Colonel Pritchard gained information from a rebel citizen that Davis was encamped in the woods about three-fourths of a mile north of town. The camp was at once surrounded, and at about 3 o'clock A. M. the force closed in and captured him and his party. Davis attempted to escape, disguised in his wife's traveling cloak, with a shawl thrown over his head, but private Adrian Bee, of Company "L," and Corporal Munger, of Company "C," espied his military boots beneath his feminine attire, and commanded him to halt. The following morning, while en route for Macon with the captives, information was received of the proffered reward of $100,000 for his capture. On arriving at Macon Colonel Pritchard, Captain Hudson, Lieutenants Stauber and Purinton, with 22 men, were detailed to escort Davis to Washington, D. C. The regiment remained at Macon until the 21st, when it started toward home, feeling that in the capture of Jefferson Davis it had indeed finished his work. It was mustered out of service and paid off at Nashville, July 1st, and left for Michigan. The regiment contained nearly 90 men from Washtenaw county. The losses sustained were: Died in action, or wounds received, 37; died of disease, 227; wounded in action, 86; taken prisoners, 162; total, 512. Skirmishes and battles, 94.

The promotions from Washtenaw county were as follows: Chas. Brooks, Sergeant to Second Lieut.; John E. Clark, Captain to Major, Brevet Lieut.-Col.; Pharo Gray, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut., Captain; James E. Sumner, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut.; George S. White, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut., Brevet Captain.

This regiment, furnished with about 150 men from Washtenaw county, left Detroit on Dec. 4, 1862, for Washington, D. C., and then joined the Army of the Potomac. It participated in the engagement at Fairfax Court-House, also in the one at Gainesville, Va. In the latter part of the year 1862 the regiment went into winter quarters at Stevensburg, Va. The regiment then served with General Kilpatrick, near Richmond, but afterward joined the forces under General Butler. It fought at Chancellorsville, at Malvern Hill, at Hawes' Shop and Coal Harbor. The regiment engaged in several brisk skirmishes during the latter part of the year, suffering severe losses. On Oct. 19, the regiment participated in the battle of Cedar Creek, charging the enemy's main line, driving them in great confusion and capturing a large number of prisoners. In November, 1864, the Fifth was attached to General Sheridan's army in the Shenandoah campaign, and at Newton was engaged in a sharp fight with a brigade of rebel cavalry, losing about 10 men. The Fifth moved, in February, 1865, with Sheridan on his celebrated raid to the James river, and at Louisa Court-House destroyed a large amount of property. The command, after tearing up track, rendering useless the locks, aqueducts and mills on the James River, destroying property, and damaging the enemy as much as possible, returned and joined the Army of the Potomac. It participated in the battles of Five Forks, Sailors' Creek and Appomattox Court-House. After Lee's surrender, the regiment proceeded to Washington, D. C., via Petersburg and North Carolina, and participated in the grand review. It was then ordered west to Leavenworth, Kansas, via St. Louis, and there mustered out of service. Arriving at Detroit July 1, it was paid off and disbanded. This regiment was almost continuously in active warfare, having engaged in 57 battles and skirmishes during its service in the field. The casualties sustained by the regiment were: Died in action or of wounds received, 99; died of disease, 73; wounded in action, 156; taken prisoners, 194; total, 522.

The promotions from this county were as follows: Henry Canfield, Sergeant to Second and First Lieut.; Myron H. Ellis, First Lieut. to Captain.

A portion of this regiment left Grand Rapids on Feb. 20, 1863, and the remainder followed in May. It was represented by nearly 60 men from this county. It arrived at Washington, and soon after entered the field. The regiment was in action at Gettysburg, July 3; Hagerstown, Maryland, July 6 and 10; Falling Waters July 14, and Culpepper Court-House, Sept. 14; Brandy Station, Oct. 13. The regiment was with the Potomac army for some time, but in the spring of 1864 joined the "Kilpatrick raid." Before Richmond the Seventh was in a desperate fight with the enemy, losing 44 men, including its commanding officer. It was once more placed with the army of the Potomac and participated in the great campaign of 1864. At the battle of Crooked Run the regiment performed splendid service, capturing 100 prisoners, arms, horses, etc. At Winchester, Virginia, in an action with the rebels, the Seventh sustained a heavy loss; also at Cedar creek on Oct. 19. It joined Sheridan in the James River raid and destroyed very much property.

Afterward the Seventh was ordered on duty at Camp Collins in the Rocky mountains, and guarded the roads in that vicinity, till it was ordered to Fort Leavenworth, where it was mustered out and arrived at Jackson on Dec. 20, 1865, and on the 25th the regiment was disbanded, each man receiving his pay from "Uncle Sam" as a Christmas present. The Seventh was engaged in 58 battles and skirmishes. The losses were: died in action, or of wounds received, 61; died of disease, 87; wounded in action, 190; taken prisoners, 75; total, 413.

This regiment, containing about 60 brave men from Washtenaw county, was organized at Mount Clemens, and entered the field in Kentucky, in May, 1863. The regiment pursued General Morgan, when on his celebrated raid into Indiana and Ohio, and at Buffington Island, Ohio, completely routed him, with a small loss. It had a brisk skirmish at Calhoun, Kentucky, with the rebels under Forrest and Wheeler, with some loss. The Eighth assisted in the defense of Knoxville. In 1863 and 1864 the regiment was engaged in active service in the States of Tennessee, Kentucky and Georgia, and succeeded in annoying the enemy very much. It encamped at Nicholasville, Kentucky, during the winter of 1864-'5. Near Lawrenceburg, Tennessee, the Eighth was attacked by the enemy during the latter part of November, and succeeded in repulsing them, but with considerable loss. It was present at the battle of Nashville from Dec. 14 to 21, but not actively engaged. The Eighth was mustered out of service at Nashville, and upon arrival at Jackson was paid and discharged. The regiment was in 39 engagements, and lost in killed in action or died of wounds received there 24 men; died of disease, 72; taken prisoners, 57; total, 153.

The Tenth Cavalry left its rendezvous at Grand Rapids Dec. 1, 1863, for Lexington, Kentucky, thence to Knoxville, via Camp Nelson. During 1864 the regiment was mostly engaged in burning bridges and destroying railroad tracks, etc. At one place eight men held a ford for three hours, preventing a rebel brigade from crossing, and only surrendered after being surrounded. It was in pursuit of Morgan in the latter part of 1864. It was then moved into Virginia, and destroyed some salt works at Saltville, thence back to Tennessee. Joining the expedition under General Stoneman, it passed into North Carolina, and destroyed a great amount of property in that State. It skirmished with the enemy at Henry Court-House, Salisbury, High Point, Statesville and Newton. After Johnston's surrender the regiment started, via Stevenson, Alabama, to Tennessee, where it was mustered out of service on November 11, and immediately started home; arriving at Jackson on the 15th, it was paid off and disbanded. The regiment engaged in 55 battles and skirmishes. The losses sustained were: Died in action or of wounds received, 15; died of disease, 140; wounded in action, 50; total, 205.

This battery was organized at Kalamazoo, Mich., and mustered into the United States service on Jan. 5, 1864. It proceeded to Washington, thence to Camp Barry. It was stationed at Fort Bunker, then moved to Fort Slocum. It participated in the action near Forts Stevens and Slocum, on July 11, 12 and 13. It had been dismantled in May, and was afterward used as heavy artillery. It garrisoned Forts Snyder, Carrol and Grebble, and continued on that duty till July 17, 1865, when it proceeded to Michigan, arriving at Jackson June 21. On July 1 it was mustered out of service. There were about 50 men in the battery from Washtenaw county. Companies B, C, D, E, G, H, I and K, and Batteries 2, 3, 5, 8 and 9 were also well represented, and performed good service during the war.

CHAPTER XV.

REMINISCENCES.

The pioneer reminiscences of the early settlers are always read with interest. In this connection is presented a few, with the regret that space forbids an increase of the number:

BY MRS. HARRIET L. NOBLE.

My husband was seized with the mania, and accordingly made preparations to start with his brother in January. They took the Ohio route, and were nearly a month in getting through, coming by way of Monroe, and thence to Ypsilanti and Ann Arbor. Mr. John Allen and Walter Ramsey with his wife and two men had been there some four or five weeks, had built a small house, moved into it the day my husband and his brother arrived, and were just preparing their first meal, which the new-comers had the pleasure of enjoying. They spent a few days there, located a farm a little above town on the River Huron, and returned through Canada. They had been so much pleased with the new country that they immediately commenced preparing to emigrate; and as near as I can recollect, we started about the 20th of September, 1824, for Michigan. We traveled from our home in Geneva to Buffalo in wagons. The roads were bad, and we were obliged to wait in Buffalo four days for a boat, as the steamer Michigan was the only one on the lake. After waiting so long we found she had put into Erie for repairs, and had no prospect of being able to run for some time. The next step was to take passage in a schooner, which was considered a terrible undertaking for so dangerous a voyage as it was then thought to be. At length we went on board the Prudence, of Cleveland, Captain Johnson. A more inconvenient little bark could not well be imagined. We were seven days on Lake Erie, and so entirely prostrated with sea-sickness, as scarcely to be able to attend to the wants of our little ones. I had a little girl of three years and a babe some nine months old, and sister Noble had six children, one an infant. It was a tedious voyage; the lake was very rough most of the time, and I thought if we were only on land again I should be satisfied, if it was a wilderness. I could not then realize what it would be to live without a comfortable home through the winter, but sad experience afterward taught me a lesson not to be forgotten.

We came into the Detroit river; it was beautiful then as now; on the Canada side, in particular, you will scarce perceive any change. As we approached Detroit, the "Cantonment," with the American flag floating on its wall, was decidedly the most interesting of any part of the town; for a city, it was certainly the most filthy, irregular place I had ever seen; the streets were filled with Indians and low French, and at that time I could not tell the difference between them. We spent two days in making preparation to go out to Ann Arbor, and during that time I never saw a genteelly dressed person in the streets. There were no carriages; the most wealthy families rode in French carts, sitting upon the bottom upon some kind of seats, and the streets were so muddy these were the only convenient vehicles for getting about. I said to myself, "If this be a Western city, give me a home in the woods."

I think it was on the 31st of October we started from Detroit, with a pair of oxen and a wagon, a few articles for cooking, and such necessaries as we could not do without. It was necessary that they should be as few as possible, for our families were a full load for this mode of traveling. After traveling all day, we found ourselves but 10 miles from Detroit (at what is now Dearborn); here we spent the night at a kind of tavern, the only one west of the city. Our lodging was the floor, and the other entertainment was to match. The next day we set out as early as possible, in hopes to get through the woods before dark, but night found us about half way through, and there remained no other resource but to camp out and make ourselves contented. The men built a large fire and prepared our supper. My sister and myself could assist but little, so fatigued were we with walking and carrying our infants. There were 15 in our company. Two gentlemen going to Ypsilanti had traveled with us from Buffalo; the remainder were our own families. We were all pretty cheerful, until we began to think of lying down for the night. The men did not seem to dread it, however, and were soon asleep, but sleep was not for me in such a wilderness. I could think of nothing but wild beasts, or something as bad; so that I had the pleasure of watching while the others slept. It seemed a long, long night, and never in my life did I feel more grateful for the blessing of returning day. We started again as early as possible, all who could walk moving on a little in advance of the wagon; the small children were the only ones who thought of riding. Every few rods it would take two or three men to pry the wagon out of the mud, while those who walked were obliged to force their way over fallen timber, brush, etc. Thus passed the day; at night we found ourselves on the plains, three miles from Ypsilanti. My feet were so swollen I could walk no further. We got into the wagon and rode as far as Woodruff's grove, a little below Ypsilanti. There were four or five families at this place.

The next day we left for Ann Arbor; we were delighted with the country before us; it was beautiful in its natural state, and I have sometimes thought that cultivation marred its loveliness. Where Ypsilanti now stands there was but one building--an old trading house on the west side of the river ; the situation was fine; there were scattering oaks and no brushwood. Here we met a large number of Indians, and one old squaw followed us some distance with her pappoose, determined to swap babies. At last she gave it up, and for once I felt relieved. We passed two log houses between this and Ann Arbor. About the middle of the afternoon we found ourselves at our journey's end, but what a prospect! There were some six or seven log huts occupied by as many inmates as could crowd into them. It was too much to think of asking strangers to give us a place to stay in even for one night under such circumstances. Mr. John Allen himself made us the offer of sharing with him the comforts of a shelter from storm, if not from the cold. His house was large for a log one, but quite unfinished; there was a ground floor and a single loft above. When we got our things stored in this place, we found the number sheltered to be 21 women and children, and 14 men. There were but two bedsteads in the house, and those who could not occupy these slept on feather-beds upon the floor. When the children were put in bed, you could not set a foot down without stepping on a foot or hand; the consequence was, we had music most of the time. We cooked our meals in the open air, there being no fire in the house but a small box stove. The fall winds were not very favorable to such business; we would frequently find our clothes on fire, but fortunately we did not often get burned. When one meal was over, however, we dreaded preparing the next. We lived in this way until our husbands got a log house raised and the roof on; this took them about six weeks, at the end of which time we went into it, without door, floor, chimney or anything but logs and roof. There were no means of getting boards for a floor, as everything must be brought from Detroit, and we could not think of drawing lumber over such a road. The only alternative was to split slabs of oak with an ax. My husband was not a mechanic, but he managed to make a floor in this way that kept us from the ground. I was most anxious for a door, as the wolves would come about in the evening, and sometimes stay all night and keep up a serenade that would almost chill the blood in my veins. Of all noises I think the howling of wolves and the yelling of Indians the most fearful,—at least it appeared so to me there when I was not able to close the door against them. I had the greatest terror of Indians, for I had never seen any before I came to Michigan but Oneidas, and they were very different, being partly civilized. We had our house comfortable as such a rude building could be by the first of February.

It was a mild winter; there was snow enough to cover the ground only four days, a fortunate circumstance for us. We enjoyed uninterrupted health, but in the spring the ague with its accompaniments gave us a call, and by the middle of August there were but four out of 14 who could call themselves well. We then fancied we were too near the river for health. We sold out and bought again 10 miles west of Ann Arbor, a place which suited us better, and just a year from the day we came to Ann Arbor moved out of it to Dexter. There was one house here, that of Judge Dexter; he was building a saw-mill and had a number of men at work at the time; besides these there was not a white family west of Ann Arbor in Michigan Territory. Our log house was just raised, forming only the square log pen. Of course it did not look very inviting, but it was our home and we must make the best of it. I helped to raise the rafters and put on the roof, but it was the last of November before our roof was completed. We were obliged to wait for the mill to run in order to get boards for making it. The door-way I had no means of closing except by hanging up a blanket, and frequently when I raised it to step out, there would be two or three of our dusky neighbors peeping in to see what was there. It would always give me such a start, I could not suppress a scream, to which they would reply with "Ugh!" and a hearty laugh. They knew I was afraid and liked to torment me. Sometimes they would throng the house and stay two or three hours. If I was alone they would help themselves to what they liked. The only way in which I could restrain them at all, was to threaten to tell Cass; he was Governor of the Territory and they stood in great fear of him.

At last we got a door. The next thing wanted was a chimney; winter was close at hand, and the stone was not drawn. I said to my husband, "I think I can drive the oxen and draw the stones, while you dig them from the ground and load them." He thought I could not, but consented to let me try. He loaded them on a kind of sled; I drove to the house, rolled them off and drove back for another load. I succeeded so well, that we got enough in this way to build our chimney. My husband and myself were four days building it. I suppose most of my lady friends would think a woman quite out of "her legitimate sphere" in turning mason; but I was not at all particular what kind of labor I performed, so we were only comfortable, and provided with the necessaries of life. Many times I had been obliged to take my children, put on their cloaks, and sit on the south side of the house in the sun to keep them warm; anything was preferable to smoke. When we had a chimney and floor, and a door to close up our little log cabin, I have often thought it the most comfortable little place that could possibly be built in so new a country, and but for the want of provisions of almost every kind, we should have enjoyed it much. The roads had been so bad all the fall, that we had waited until this time, and I think it was December when my husband went to Detroit for supplies. Fifteen days were consumed in going and coming. We had been without flour for three weeks or more, and it was hard to manage with young children thus. After being without bread three or four days, my little boy, two years old, looked me in the face and said, "Ma, why don't you make bread; don't you like it? I do." His innocent complaint brought forth the first tears I had shed in Michigan, on account of any privations I had to suffer, and they were about the last. I am not of a desponding disposition, nor often low-spirited, and having left New York to make Michigan my home I had no idea of going back, or being very unhappy. Yet the want of society, Church privileges, and in fact almost every thing that makes life desirable, would often make me sad in spite of all effort to the contrary. I had no ladies' society for one year after coming to Dexter, except that of sister Noble and a Mrs. Taylor, and was more lonely than either of them, my family being so small. The winter passed rather gloomily, but when spring came, everything looked delightful. We thought our hardships nearly at an end, when early in the summer my husband was taken with the ague. He had not been sick at all the first year; of course he must be acclimated. He had never suffered from ague or fever of any kind before, and it was a severe trial for him with so much to do, and no help to be had. He would break the ague and work for a few days, when it would return. In this way he made his gardens, planted his corn, and thought he was quite well. About August he harvested his wheat and cut his hay, but could get no help to draw it, and was again taken with the ague. I had it myself, and both my children. Occasionally we would all be ill at a time.

Mr. Noble and I had it every other day. He was almost discouraged, and said he should have to sell his cattle, or let them starve. I said to him, "To-morrow we shall neither of us have the ague, and I believe I can load and stack the hay if my strength permits." As soon as breakfast was over, I prepared to go into the meadow, where I loaded and stacked seven loads that day. The next day my husband had the ague more severely than common, but not so with me; the exercise broke the chills, and I was able to assist him whenever he was well enough, until our hay was all secured. In the fall we had several added to our circle. We were more healthy then, and began to flatter ourselves that we could live very comfortably through the winter of 1829; but we were not destined to enjoy that blessing, for in November my husband had his left hand blown to pieces by the accidental discharge of a gun, which confined him to the house until April. The hay I had stacked through the summer I had to feed out to the cattle with my own hand in the winter, and often cut the wood for three days at a time. The logs which I alone rolled in, would surprise any one who had never been put to the test of necessity, which compels people to do what under any other circumstances they would not have thought possible.

The third winter in Michigan was decidedly the hardest I had yet encountered. In the spring Mr. Noble could go out, by carrying his hand in a sling. He commenced plowing, to prepare for planting his corn. Being weak from his wound, the ague returned again, but he worked every other day, until his corn was planted.

He then went to New York, came back in July, and brought a nephew with him, who relieved me from helping him in the work out of doors. Although I was obliged to stack the hay this third fall, I believe it was the last labor of the kind I ever performed. At this time we began to have quite a little society; we were fortunate in having good neighbors, and for some years were almost like one family, our interest being the same, and envy, jealousy and all bitter feeling unknown among us. We cannot speak so favorably of the present time.

When I look upon my life and see the ups and downs, the hardships and trials I have been called upon to endure, I feel no wish to be young again. I was in the prime of life when I came to Michigan, only 27, and my husband was 33. Neither of us knew the reality of hardships. Could we have known what it was to be pioneers in a new country, we would never have had the courage to come; but I am satisfied with all the disadvantages of raising a family in a new country, there is a consolation in knowing that our children are prepared to brave the ills of life, I believe, far better than they would have been, had we never left New York.

BY MRS. N. H. PIERCE.

Moved like others gone before him, by a spirit of unrest,
 My beloved Yankee father, with his family journeyed west,
 Seeking other fields of labor, and 'mid other scenes to roam,
 And, mayhaps, a site securing for a pleasant, prosperous home.
 In the rush of emigration, following still the hand of fate,
 Leaving old-time friends and neighbors, came to this new-growing State,
 Which was yet a Territory, with resources vast and grand,
 'Twas the nucleus of wonder in its rich and varied land,
 And its climate, pure, salubrious, and its timber, salt and coal,
 With a thousand ways thrown open leading on to wealth untold,
 As the hand of earnest labor should its treasures rich unfold.
 In the spring, if I remember ('twas the year of '38),
 We arrived upon the borders of our yet wild Indian State,
 To the small but growing city (such the city of the straits),
 Where we pitched our tents a season, thinking there to make our home,
 But again not quite contented, on still farther west would come.

On the cars as far as Ypsilanti, from thence we were conveyed in lumber wagons over rough roads, through wild woodlands. There were few cultivated farms or human habitations all along our route to Ann Arbor, which was then a small village.

My father, John Monroe, was contractor on the railroad, building it in sections from Ypsilanti to Ann Arbor, and also in the years following between Ann Arbor and Jackson, employing many men grading the road bed, laying the ties and getting it ready for the iron. About the third year after we came here my father purchased the farm known as the "Tagg farm," about one mile east, on the Ypsilanti road. Dwight Kellogg was our nearest neighbor; his home, a fine large brick residence, still stands, although he and his wife have long since paid the debt of nature, and his children are scattered far and wide. On the other hand we had Col. White and his son Henry, old farmers, Mr. Botsford, Mr. Foster, Keedle, Glazier and others, many of whom have long since passed away. In that part of Ann Arbor known as Lower Town, or fifth ward, a gentleman, Jas. Jones, Esq., and his family still reside, who, having come here when the country was entirely new, remember many interesting incidents of its early settlement. He first located about three miles west of Ann Arbor, on the Dexter road. The only pathway through the woods from there to Ann Arbor was by "marked trees." His house, nearly a mile from his nearest neighbor, was built of logs, without roof save a few rough slabs, without doors or windows—nothing to bar against the intrusion of bears, wolves and Indians, except loose blankets. "When it rained," he said, "more rain fell inside the house than outside." One day, when Mrs. Jones lay sick with the ague, having been left alone with her baby, she was horrified to discover a loathsome reptile, of the lizard species, crawling across her floor. In her weak and nervous state of health she "felt as if the house was full of them," and suffered accordingly. Snakes and other reptiles were plentiful; wolves frequently howled about the place at midnight, curdling their blood with fears of impending destruction. This was during the year 1831. One day Mrs. Jones took her baby, afraid to leave it alone, and went half a mile from home for water. On her return with her pail in one hand and her child in the other, she came across a monstrous blue racer lying directly in her way. To use her own words, "Its head was up glaring at her with glittering eyes, and it was as large around the body as a stovepipe." Fear lent her wings and she reached her home nearly dead with fright, not daring to look behind for fear of pursuit. A few days after this was the 3d of July. A shower came up in the evening; the night was intensely dark, and Mr. Jones and his wife were quietly talking of going to Ann Arbor (then consisting of six or seven houses) to spend the 4th of July. Just then they were startled by the savage yell of Indians, and feeling that they were at the mercy of the red-skins, if they were bent upon their destruction, Mr. Jones advised his wife to take her babe and escape through the window, and flee to the house of her brother-in-law, Mr. Dillon, who lived a mile away, and he would stay and protect their home. Thereupon he took his knife in his hand and stood at the door, resolved to sell his life dearly. One of the belligerents became entangled in the brush of a fallen tree, when the other said in a familiar voice, "Get out of that tall grass." A good laugh followed the discovery that it was only a little plan on the part of two of their neighbors to scare them for fun.

An old Indian used frequently to bring to Mrs. Dillon berries, venison, baskets, etc., which he wished to exchange for food or anything else he could get. Growing weary of his importunities, he was ordered to go away and not come again. While she was resting on a lounge beneath an open window one day, a swarthy face peered in above her and a guttural "boo zhoo" sounded in her ears and startled her. She again ordered him away, but he insisted on having some food. Then she gave him a slice of bread and butter. But something had aroused his suspicions, and he asked her to taste of it herself, which she refused to do. He then went away muttering, threw the bread away, and was never seen afterward in that neighborhood.

The brick blocks on Broadway, in the fifth ward, were erected by Mr. Josiah Beckley and Anson Brown. These pioneers were fully determined that Ann Arbor should be on this side of the river. Mr. James came with Mr. Brown to select a lot to build a house upon. The hazel bushes and wild plum-trees were so thick that he could "only find his way back by the rags that had been torn off and left hanging on the bushes." The house that Mr. Jones built was the first frame house in the lower town, whither he removed his family. It was afterward sold to Solomon Doty, boot and shoe dealer. The house has recently passed into the hands of Fred Alber, who is making many improvements in and about the place. Anson Brown kept the postoffice and a dry-goods store, employing Mr. McCollum as bookkeeper in the year 1833. Mr. McCollum is still living, and remarkably active and industrious for his age, having passed his 83d year. He has raised a large family.

Dr. Cowles was the first physician locating in Ann Arbor. He officiated in nearly every family, and was regarded with great favor by all who knew him. His widow is still living. The first child that he introduced upon this stage of action was Mrs. Crowel, third daughter of Mr. Jones, in 1844. The Washtenaw hotel was built in 1832, and was said to be the best hotel between Detroit and Jackson. W. R. Thompson was proprietor. Having some idea of going into the mercantile business, he (Jones) thought of buying out a store in the upper town. An invoice taken revealed "half a barrel of whisky, with a nail on the side holding a tin cup, three open-top thimbles, five darning needles, and a hank of black linen thread." Mr. J. concluded the stock was too heavy and he turned his attention to cooperating.

In the year 1840 the first train of cars came to Ann Arbor. It was an occasion of great rejoicing. Mr. Thomas Holmes, who kept a select school in the old Baptist church, dismissed his school for a half holiday. We marched with our teacher in good order to the residence of Dr. Ormsby, on the hill just north of the grist-mill, and now occupied by Eli Moore, to await its coming. When at length it appeared, laden with excursionists, our joy knew no bounds. A grand jubilee followed, long to be remembered by all who participated. And the question has often presented itself to our minds since, "Why did he not take us to the station, if he wanted to give us a treat, instead of to a hill a quarter of a mile away?" Mr. Holmes was a good teacher, and many of his scholars, now parents and grandparents, remember his school with pleasure.

In the spring of 1845 an accident occurred, which is worthy of note in this little sketch—the breaking of the bridge on the Huron. It happened on Sunday. There were to be several people baptized by immersion in the river, and the bridge was just about thronged with the spectators of the scene. While in the middle of the solemn ceremony the bridge suddenly gave way, precipitating several hundred people, men, women and children, into the rushing stream. Such screaming, shouts and confusion followed as was truly appalling! Hats, bonnets, parasols, etc., went floating away with the water. What seemed a matter of great wonderment was the fact that of all the people thrown in such a mass, with the debris and the broken bridge, not one was killed and none seriously injured, beyond a thorough ducking and the damage done to clothing. Of course this unlooked for episode ended the exercises of the day on short order. D. T. McCollum, Jas. Jones and many others who were on terra firma, and thus escaped, did much in rescuing and caring for half-drowned humanity.

There have been several newspaper publications in the lower town. The "Signal of Liberty," an anti-slavery organ, was published by the Rev. Guy Beckley and a Mr. Foster, on the east side of Broadway. At an office or offices on the other side we had "The Gem of Science," published by Sanford & Sanford, also a weekly; "The Primitive Expounder," a semi-monthly, by Thornton & Billings, two Universalist ministers; "The Alphadelphie Tocsin," published in the interest of the Alphadelphian Association, located in Kalamazoo. Besides these there was the "Native American," a political paper; the "Young Yankee," devoted to light reading and amusement; "The Corrector," instituted to make crooked people walk straight, an organ much needed even at the present day. The last named, however, were short-lived, and expired after an ephemeral existence of a few months.

There was a large paper mill erected by a Mr. Jones and Mr. Foley, and successfully run by them for a few years. It then became the property of Norman Chapin, who conducted it on a small scale for some years; finally it was consumed by fire in 1866, and the Agricultural Works, by Moore & Son, erected on its site where they now stand, owned and controlled by Messrs. Moore, Finnegan & Howard. They also erected the fine large square house now occupied by Dr. Kellogg, a clairvoyant physician of considerable note, as a boarding house for the employes; but these failed after a time, and for years the old mill stood still.

In the course of time, the city proper having been located in upper town, improvements have gone on rapidly, while the lower town, admitted some time after the rest of Ann Arbor became a city, progressed very slowly.

During the war of the rebellion a large percentage of the male population joined in the ranks and went to fight for the Union. Seventy-five old and young men went from this ward alone; fighting valiantly in the cause of freedom, they left a glorious record behind them, not one having proved recreant to his trust. Some of these brave men came through this terrible ordeal unscathed. A few of those who fell were brought home and interred here; the greatest number, stricken upon the battle-field, or languished and died in hospitals, were buried we know not where. The patriotic people of this ward have erected a monument to their memory, and a society of ladies has been organized for the purpose of keeping their memories green in the hearts of a grateful people. This society is known as the Fifth Ward Ladies' Decoration Society. They number about 20 members, and have a president, vice-president, treasurer and secretary. They hold semi-monthly meetings, and elect officers yearly; give socials, parties, lectures, and various entertainments to keep up the interest and supply the treasury with means to meet the expenses of Memorial Day, which is observed with much ceremony, and is an occasion of deep feeling and gratitude toward the noble dead. Usually a large number of people join in the solemn exercises, such as speaking, singing, music, and the scattering of flowers. Children bear an important part, to impress upon the young heart a true spirit of patriotism.

Many of the old pioneers of this section of Washtenaw county have passed away. A few yet remain. Among those who have closed their records of earthly events, I will mention a few well-known in this section: John Monroe and his wife Electa Monroe, my parents; Col. White and wife, Mrs. Foster, Mr. Glazier, Mr. and Mrs. Hicks, Mr. and Mrs. Dwight Kellogg, Day Belding, Laban Felch, who gave two of his sons a sacrifice upon the altar of liberty; Mr. Greenman, who was blown up in his match factory and died six months afterward on account of the accident; Dr. Cowles, Solomon Doty, Chet Ingals, Nell Benham, Nate Burnam, T. A. Haviland, for many years a blacksmith and machinist; Chas. Vail, J. H. Lund, formerly a merchant; Bill Sinclair, for many years owner of the large flouring mills; Dr. Irish, Rial B. Chase, Mr. Matthews, Mr. Powell, Mr. and Mrs. Wait, Dr. Kellogg; the Misses Vail, who taught school in the basement of their residence on Broadway when we who are grandmothers were little children. So time moves on bearing all in its restless course.

In 1874 there was an explosion in this quiet section, which for a time filled the inhabitants with consternation. It occurred in the store of A. Herz, and was occasioned by a fire which exploded a keg of gunpowder. The heavy walls of masonry were torn and rent from cellar to garret, and although 20 persons were injured, none were killed, and only one dangerously injured. While the great heart of the world throbs on in the rush and flow of events scarcely a ripple of commotion reaches our quiet corner. But the advent of a new railroad is now looked forward to with much interest in the hope of its proving an impetus to the spirit of improvement. The people are generally united, intelligent, industrious, and while we have none very wealthy or very poor, all are law-abiding and happy.

BY MRS. TIMOTHY W. HUNT.

In the year 1802 Hon. John Hunt, of the town of Union, Conn., moved to Onondaga county, New York—then a wilderness—with a numerous family of children. His youngest son, Timothy W., will be the subject of this sketch.

He was born in 1799. At the age of four years he was deprived of death of a tender mother's care. Between the age of 16 and 21, he served as an apprentice at tanning and currying with Col. Hickory, at Skaneatele. At the age of 22 he commenced his business on the homestead, his brother conducting the farm, dividing their interests. About that time we formed an acquaintance. As years passed our attachment increased, and we were married February, 1825, by Rev. J. Moore. We lived on the homestead several years. In the meantime the Erie canal was completed, and his business became unprofitable. Therefore he concluded to go West in search of a farm. In the spring of 1828 he left home, traveling through Western New York. Not being satisfied with such farms as his limited means would allow him to purchase, and learning that there was a schooner to leave Dunkirk for Detroit, he embarked for that place. On arriving at Detroit, and hearing of beautiful land further west, he took the trail leading to Ann Arbor; still farther to Lodi plains. There he selected a few lots on sections 26 and 35. The land-office being then at Detroit, it became necessary to make the 40-mile trip on foot in order to secure them. On his return he bought an ax, chopped and hauled logs and rolled up the body of a house. Capt. Lowery manufactured the shingles and roofed it, while my husband returned East for his family, he being absent nearly three months. Immediately on his arrival preparations were completed for our departure. Taking our two little ones in our arms we bade our friends an affectionate good-bye. The children had entwined themselves very closely to aged grandpa's heart. His youngest son also to leave his home, methinks the scene was not unlike the patriarch Jacob parting with his youngest son Benjamin. It was the last farewell, as he lived three months, then bade adieu to earthly scenes. On June 17th we were seated in a canal boat at Syracuse and were five days reaching Buffalo. As we had time we improved it by a carriage ride of 22 miles to view Niagara Falls. We took passage on the steamboat Superior, and were five days crossing Lake Erie. Detroit was then the capital of the Territory. The inhabitants were principally French. Their houses were singular in appearance, being very low, with sharp pointed roofs, wood colored and dingy.

We put up at the only hotel in the city. The Legislature, which was then in session, dined at the same house. They gave us a cordial reception to the new Territory of Michigan. My husband bought an ox team at Pontiac, 30 miles distant, and hitched them to a wagon we had brought with us. My parents, three sisters and ourselves, left Detroit the third day, and stopped for the night at Spring Mills. The mosquitoes were legion in numbers. Our warfare was incessant, and we all thought retreat the better part of valor. The team came around, and we left the log tavern in haste. The moon shone its brightest; dewdrops glistened on shrubs and flowers; the shrill notes of the whippoorwill and the sound of the wagon wheels bounding over pole bridges, broke the stillness, and the varied echo made our night's journey delightful. At sunrise we halted for breakfast and rest. Again proceeding on our journey the heat became intense, and our progress necessarily slow. The wayside was strewn with flowers, and many were gathered to amuse ourselves and children. The next day we cut our way through brush to the homes of three of my brothers. There we tarried a few days to rest; then hauling our household goods from Detroit, again resumed our wearisome march toward our place of destination. A few miles through dense woods, then across a small plain near where Capt. Dire had erected a grist-mill, from there over numerous hills until we reached the Huron river, which we forded, there being no bridge across it. Here was Ann Arbor. It comprised a few small houses nestled amongst the scattering burr-oaks. The surrounding scenery was delightful. We tarried all night at the only tavern. As morning came we were eager for our last day's journey. Through the woods we went, passing two houses in the midst before reaching Lodi plains, which nature had adorned profusely with flowers of every hue, interspersed amongst the tall grass, with here and there a shady oak, which together with a few neat log houses completed the landscape.

On that beautiful plain we found our frontier home the 9th of July. Not a white man's abode west of us, within our knowledge, between there and the Rocky Mountains. Shall I describe our house? As long as the logs would admit it, being without a door, window, hearth or chimney, a floor in the center, corners without, we built the fire against the green logs. When the smoke disturbed us we carried the fire out doors and cooked there. Ofttimes we could peer through between the logs and see the deer feeding in numbers near the house; turkeys too, in flocks; aye! more, the red men by hundreds, as they passed by on a well-beaten track, going to Detroit and Malden to receive presents from the different governments. They often filled the house, there being no door to shut them out. Then the wolves organized regularly at sunset, and made the air ring with their highest notes. One night a stray one sneaked in under the blanket and scratched on the meat barrel, but a halloo from the bed made him beat a hasty retreat, and as civilization advanced they with the red men retreated westward.

In August my husband and one of our little ones were prostrated with a fever. It often became necessary for me to leave the sick ones alone, and go with a sad heart and hasty step to my nearest neighbor, half a mile distant, for water to cool their parched lips and aching heads. About the middle of October, our eldest son was born. Our house being in the same unfinished condition, all our sash, glass, with many other necessary articles were to be hauled from Detroit by ox teams over almost impassable roads, but by the last of November our home was made comfortable. Surely we were thankful! March, 1829, my husband started for Syracuse, N. Y. After leaving Mr. Miller at Saline, he followed the Indian trail, without a track excepting those made by the prowling wolf, nearly to Monroe, at which place he arrived late in the evening. He pursued his way through the Maumee swamp, Ohio—which contained at that time only one house within 40 miles—making the entire journey on foot. In his absence an Indian crept noiselessly to the door, opened it wide enough to show his keen eye and feather in his hair, and seeing a nice fire walked in, three urchins following. I bade them begone. He pointed to a corner, where they spent the night. Oh! what should I do? Every limb trembled with fear. Escape was impossible with my children—the oldest not four years, the youngest five months old—and my nearest neighbor being half a mile distant. He called for potatoes and made signs for milk. He was supplied. He appeared friendly, and my fears gradually subsided. I slept quietly, hugging my three nestlings, and when the day dawned the red man went as he came.

In the years 1831 and 1832 my husband, with his partner, Capt. Lowery, made three trips to Ohio and Indiana, and bought oxen and cows. While driving back, their mode of spending the night, was to select a thick-topped tree to protect them from dew or rain, then wrap themselves in their blankets and lie down to rest on the ground. When morning came they would collect the drove and continue on. It required some weeks to accomplish the trip. Well, in progress of time broad fields were cultivated. Our children were educated and provided with new homes. Churches and seminaries with many other public works to be performed in a new country, were accomplished, all of which my husband joined in most heartily. His motto was, "Liberty to the fugitive, captive, and oppressed, and sympathy for the poor." His doors were always open to the weary traveler.

It is now 50 years since Rev. J. Moore bade us good night. Many happy days we have spent together; some of sorrow. Our two daughters died many years ago, leaving husbands, children, parents and brothers to mourn their loss. After enjoying our beautiful home for many years in a friendly, intelligent society, and also making many excursions by land and water, God, in his providence, afflicted me with a stroke of paralysis. Soon after, my husband's health failed. His devotedness to me was without a parallel. Ofttimes during the past year he has remarked he had but one tie to bind him to earth, and that was helpless me. The same tender regard was manifested until the last. He took my hand, and said that few had lived so long and happily together as we had; then put his face so affectionately to my cheek! May memory cherish it while life lasts. He died in full assurance of a blessed immortality and eternal life beyond.

BY SAMUEL PETTIBONE.*

After listening to the graphic and particular history of the Toledo war, I was sorry that while the pen was in good hands he had not gone further.

Mr. Goodrich left the valiant army at Toledo. He might have gone on and given the reason of the retreat.

When the heat of war is over, so that we can look calmly, we can see that the Governor of Ohio took the wisest course. Instead of meeting and charging on our troops, when there would have been blood shed—for we cannot suppose that our troops would run, in the face of any foe—he sent post haste to Old Hickory, who swore by the Great Eternal that the Governor of Michigan should suffer for his audacity.

The messenger was directed to return with all possible dispatch, call on the Governor of Michigan, who was Stevens T. Mason, wherever he could be found, whether in camp or office, and hand him this dispatch. Mason was the acting Governor by virtue of being Secretary of State under Governor Porter, who had died.

Governor Mason, as general commander of all the forces of Michigan, was on the ground at Toledo, called out the troops—some said for a dress parade—was on his horse, in front, when the messenger arrived and handed him a paper. The Governor sheathed his sword, called his orderly to hold his horse by the bits, whilst he could open and read.

When he had read the dispatch he drew his sword, put his military hat on the point of it, and instead of saying "Forward, march!" he proclaimed to the astonished host that he was no longer Governor of Michigan, swinging his hat three times around his head, and threw it to the ground.

Our army was without a leader, and on foreign soil.

The writer was not there, but his horse was, and came back spoiled, as many others did. It was said by some that they were spoiled on the retreat, in seeing which would get off of the disputed territory first.

So much, I say, Mr. Goodrich might have said, if he had thought of it.

Some may say, What has the above to do with Washtenaw county? But was it not the pioneers of this county who bore the most of the expense, and did the most of the fighting? And is not the transaction a link in the chain of events that Washtenaw county has been the most conspicuous in?

Let us look at a few of the most remarkable events in which the pioneers of Washtenaw county have borne a conspicuous part. General Jackson, then President of the United States, soon sent on a Mr. Horner for our Governor. He soon started from Detroit to make a tour of the State, to meet his friends of the interior, see the wants of the people, etc. At the end of the first day's journey he reached Ypsilanti, and put up at Dr. Andrews' tavern, on the west side of the river. He expected to meet such Jackson men as Major John Gilbert, the first sheriff of the county, Major Benjamin Woodruff, Colonel Owen Welch, etc. But when he stepped on to the verandah in the mild and balmy evening, to speak to the people, what must have been his astonishment to be met in the way he was! He found an audience waiting the appointed time, and they came prepared. Cow bells, in those days, were plenty, and every cow had been robbed. Old tin pans, log chains, in fact everything that could make a noise, was brought into use. Such a noise was never heard before, nor will it ever be again.

The Doctor got the Governor inside the house, and protected him from personal violence, as any well-bred landlord should; but to receive such a welcome from his political friends was too much. Early in the morning he took the back track, and it was said he did not stop until he reached Detroit. He found that his Jackson men were all Mason men; and when he left Detroit again, he went from whence he came—Pennsylvania.

Some may say, What has this to do with the pioneers of Washtenaw? Is it not a part of the history of our State and county? And were they not all pioneers then? And what great event has ever happened in the State, that the pioneers of Washtenaw county have not had their hand in?

Look at the cholera war in which there was blood shed. (Mr. Goodrich says there was none in the Toledo war.) Our Legislative Council got scared at the approach of the cholera, and passed a law—and it was duly signed by Stevens T. Mason, then acting Governor—that the authorities of each town or village might prohibit emigrants and travelers from entering their villages, and gave authority to call out the militia for that purpose.

When it became known at Ypsilanti that the cholera was in Detroit, and many were fleeing—some had come to Ypsilanti, and died in a few hours after arriving—the authorities did, according to the law, call out a company of militia. The company was commanded by a Yankee from Vermont, by the name of Josiah Burton, and he meant to do his duty. The company was stationed at Bowen's tavern, three miles east of Ypsilanti, on the Chicago turnpike. When the stage owned by Samuel Stackhouse came along from Detroit with the mail and passengers, it was stopped, and a parley ensued; but there was no arrangement made, and the driver started to run by. Captain Burton gave the order to fire, when one of the leading horses fell. There was supposed to be one dead horse at least, but when he was examined he showed signs of life, and was helped up, when the driver put whip to his horses, and he was allowed to go without another shot. The ball had gone through the horse's head, between the skin and forehead bone, so he was knocked down, drawing some blood.

Was not this done by the pioneers of Washtenaw? Where are the actors in that scene now? Captain Burton is supposed to be alive, and if so, is living at a place called Clay Bank, in Oceana county, on the shore of Lake Michigan, north of Muskegon.

As he is the only one that I know of, I will give a brief history of his life. Born in Manchester, Vermont, he lived there until he came to Ypsilanti, where he lived a few years. He then went to Grand Rapids, located land that is now worth several thousand dollars per acre, on which he could not get rich fast enough, sold out, and built a few saw-mills. When the gold fever raged he went to California. Not succeeding, he started for Australia, and brought up at the Sandwich Islands. He lived several years among the natives, was heard of by our minister, Mr. Ten Eyck, was put on board of a ship coming to New York, and on his way called at Ypsilanti. When he arrived at Grand Rapids he found his estate administered upon, divided and spent.

The cholera brought up another circumstance, that some of the old settlers will remember some part of.

The writer, at that time, lived east of Bowen's tavern on the Chicago road, and the news of the fight with the stage occasioned many to wish to avoid the guard and the village; so I often acted as pilot, to run them past Ypsilanti. A few days after the battle with the stage, along came the Governor, Stevens T. Mason, on his way, he said, to Mottville, on the St. Jo. He wanted to run the guard and slun Ypsilanti. We went across the north part of the plain, crossed Huron at the upper bridge, and came into the Chicago road on top of the hill west of the village. It was four miles to the first tavern west, and only half a mile back into the village, and by going around we had not passed a tavern after leaving Sheldon's. The pressure was too great—he must go back to the village. He was arrested by Eliphalet Turner, who brought him to the sheriff, Dr. Withington, and after a stormy and short discussion, the Governor was allowed to depart, and he instantly started for Mottville. The first official act the Governor was known to do, was to take away the Doctor's commission as sheriff, and he appointed in his stead William Anderson, of Ann Arbor.

I now think of only one great political movement but what the pioneers of Washtenaw county started, and many of them carried out in this county. Look at the convention that was gotten up in this county, that voted to give up Toledo for the sake of becoming a State. A most liberal election was had, when men, women and children were invited to vote, and negroes did vote.

Look, again, at the mass meeting in this county that started the great Whig party. Were they not the farmers and pioneers of Washtenaw?

I would venture a small wager, that the most prominent men of the county, the most wealthy, and as much respected for being good citizens, as any others, were a larger portion of them runaways from York State than in any other county.

I see different ones are giving short sketches of their arrival and privations in Michigan. I can say that when I arrived in Detroit, in 1830, I was without a penny, but by doing a few jobs of surveying I obtained a few dollars. I returned to Onondaga county, and on the 12th of February, 1831, started again to come to Michigan, with only one dollar in my pocket. At Canandaigua I borrowed five dollars of an old acquaintance, and came through Canada, arrived in Detroit the 1st day of March, penniless, and in the same condition started for Ypsilanti, and slept that night on Conrad Ten Eyck's bar-room floor. The next day, arrived at Ypsilanti. My boots were worn through so that the water inside came as high as it did on the outside. On the Chicago road I waded for 40 rods together, with the water a foot deep, or more.

In April I started for White Pigeon land-office. At Tecumseh was overtaken by a severe snow-storm, on the 12th, which made good sleighing for several days. Was persuaded by General Brown not to go any further, as travelers from the West said the snow was 18 inches deep. In July was attacked with the ague, came back to Ypsilanti, and went into the town of Superior, to my cousin's, where I had a long run of fever. In October I met my family in Detroit, and took them to Superior. Went to Detroit and located in company with Charles Ball, an 80-acre lot, seven miles east of Ypsilanti—the last lot unsold between Ypsilanti and Detroit. Took my family of wife and three children into the neighborhood, put up the body of a log house, got trusted for 1,000 feet of green white-wood lumber, at Pine's mill, laid down a floor and chamber floor, and partitioned 12 feet from the back end—the snow a foot deep, and very cold—and moved in between Christmas and New Year, without any roof, door, or windows, no chimking, and no chimney but a space in the chamber floor for the smoke to go up. Shook two hours, three days in the week, with the ague, and did not get on a shake roof until into February. The Black Hawk war and cholera drove me to Ypsilanti, where I stayed several years.

In the Black Hawk war there were a hundred or more Indians, mostly on horses, passed along the Chicago road, on their way to Detroit. After getting whisky at Ypsilanti, they were in a good condition to scare the women. My wife gave them all she had in the house to eat, when they went to the next house. They were partially drunk, and very saucy. The fright she never recovered from.

BY MRS. ALVIN CROSS.

I was born in the year 1805, in the town of Colerain, near Boston. My maiden name was Elna Rogers. My father's name was Thomas Rogers. When I was about four years of age my parents removed to New York. They settled in Steuben Co., in the town of Cohocton, from which place they removed to Bloomingville, Ohio, in 1816. Here my parents both died, leaving five children. Having no one to care for the family we were soon scattered, and I found a home with the family of Mr. Oronte Grant.

Mr. Grant owned a large prairie farm, not far from Sandusky, which was well cultivated and valuable. Unfortunately the title was not good, and after paying for the land, improving, stocking it, etc., he was obliged to give it up. Three years were allowed him in which to provide a new home, and he determined that it should be situated where no previous title would disturb him—in the wilde of Michigan.

At the time of which I write there resided on a part of Mr. Grant's farm a Mr. Benjamin Woodruff, pettifogger and school-teacher, whose wife had just fallen heir to several hundred dollars from her grandfather's estate. They wished to invest this in a home where land was cheap, and he decided to accompany Mr. Grant.

A wagon was loaded with provisions, and driving Mr. Grant's large stock of cattle they started for Monroe. The company consisted of four men, Messrs. Woodruff and Grant, William Eiclor—Mrs. Woodruff's brother—and Hiram Tuttle, a neighbor, who also had cattle to drive.

At Monroe they sold the cattle, reserving only such as would be needed on the farms which they intended to purchase. Here also they were joined by four men, Mr. Stiles, Mr. Willard Hall, Mr. George Hall and Captain Fair, who were fishing at Monroe. These men were former acquaintances of Woodruff and Grant, and were familiar with the new country along the course of the Huron river, having been up as far as a place called Godfrey's trading post, now City of Ypsilanti.

From their representations it was thought best to view that part of the Territory, and thither the company proceeded, leaving Mr. Eiclor in charge of the cattle and provisions. After selecting and locating their farms it was necessary to return to Monroe for the oxen, provisions, etc., leaving Mr. Stiles and his party to subsist by hunting and fishing until their return, they being the only white inhabitants of the region.

On the first of June, 1823, they were ready to commence the building of Mr. Woodruff's house. The unbroken forest lay before them, and with the sound of their axes began the new settlement, afterward called Woodruff's Grove.

When the work was well commenced, Woodruff and Grant went back to Ohio, leaving the building to be finished by the others of the party, under the supervision of Mr. Tuttle. Mr. Woodruff intended to return with his family—which consisted of wife, six children and hired woman, Mrs. Snow—before the fourth of the next month, that they might celebrate the great national holiday in their new home. They failed to accomplish this, not arriving until the sixth, and the festivities were postponed until the following year.

Detroit was their only postoffice, and wishing a more definite address for letters, Mr. Woodruff visited the city, and after consulting the Governor, gave the settlement the name of Woodruff's Grove.

He then purchased a boat, which was their only means of procuring supplies of provisions, lumber, etc., until fall, when a road was cut through to Detroit.

Early in the following spring of 1824 Mr. Grant made preparations to return with his family, which consisted of Mrs. Grant, a young girl named Jane Johnson, and myself. Mr. Tuttle's wife and child were also of our company. We shipped at a small place called Venice, in the vessel Costello, and took with us provisions enough, as Mr. Grant supposed, to last until crops could be raised.

There were four bushels of flour, one barrel of meal, one of shelled corn, one of honey, two barrels of potatoes, one barrel of wheat, one cask of pork, one barrel of oats, and a large box of beans and garden seeds. We also had a half barrel in which were carefully packed, in moist earth and moss, small apple-trees, currant bushes, rose bushes, lilac, snowball and other shrubs. There was also a large box of carpenter's tools and such bedding and furniture as was considered most necessary.

We were three days in reaching Detroit; there we were obliged to wait three days for the boat to come up from the Grove after us. We were six days in reaching the Grove, stopping the first night at Willard's tavern. The second day we reached the mouth of the Huron, and stopped at a French house. The third night we were kindly entertained at the house of a half-breed, named Parks. The next day we reached King's settlement; this was Saturday, and here we spent the Sabbath, the men who poled the boat being glad to rest.

Monday night we camped in the woods; and Tuesday about noon reached our destination, on the flats, about half a mile down the river from the Grove, where Mr. Tuttle had prepared a home for his family. When we were ready to land, the men began to exchange smiling glances; and Mrs. Tuttle and Mrs. Grant realizing all at once that this wilderness must now be to them home, began to cry. Jane and I were too young and light-hearted to sympathize with such feelings, and gaily started to see the house, but soon returned, not being able to find anything but a small building, which we supposed to be a sheep-pen. Our ignorance was quite excusable, for the low, rough log pen, without floor or windows, did not resemble a human habitation. It taxed our ingenuity to prepare dinner on a fire of blazing logs built at one end of the room. There was no fire-place and no chimney, a hole in the roof allowing the smoke to escape. Mrs. Woodruff came down before night to welcome the new arrivals, and I returned with her. That night I first heard the howling of wolves, and was unable to sleep. Next morning, as I stood in the door of Mr. Woodruff's house and looked around, I felt homesick.

During the previous fall, several families had been added to the settlement. Daniel Cross, John Bryan, Mr. Noyce and Mr. Brainard. There were now in sight eight small log huts, built in the same manner as Mr. Tuttle's, except that those of Messrs. Bryan, Cross and Woodruff had rough floors and stick chimneys. Mr. Grant's house was the one occupied by Mr. Stiles, and as soon as Stiles could move on to his farm, Mr. Grant came to the Grove to live.

George Hall and his brother, and a Mr. Beverly, had built on the west side of the river, near the place now occupied by the paper mill.

Work now began in earnest. Roads were cut in different directions, a landing made for boats where Rawsonville now is, land cleared, etc. In May, Mr. Jason Cross and his brother-in-law, Avery, came in. They both had families of grown up children, who were quite an addition to the working force of the place. Mr. Grant owned the farm now belonging to Mr. E. King, and there are still standing there some of the apple-trees we brought from Ohio. Daniel Cross owned the farm which now belongs to Benjamin Emerick. Mr. Tuttle's place is occupied by his son John Tuttle; on these farms land was broken and corn planted. A young man named McCord, who lived with Mr. Tuttle, also planted corn on the farm now belonging to Mrs. Crittenden.

On the Tuttle and Grant farms were old Indian corn-fields, which were easily put under cultivation. Mr. Woodruff did not work on his farm, but rented it, and gave up his time to helping people who were coming in.

The Indians passed through the place in June, the company numbering between 300 and 400, all marching in single file. They were peaceable and inoffensive, and continued so, until they were furnished with whisky by the white people.

Deer were plenty, and bears, wolves and wild-cats abounded. Venison was the most common article on our bill of fare.

A few logs, together with bark scattered around, which had the appearance of having been used for a roof, was all that remained of Godfrey's trading post, in the spring of 1824. Near by this, on the bank of the river, was a fine spring, and here a Mr. Stewart built the first house. On the west side of the river, in Ypsilanti, others soon joined him, and quite a settlement sprang up during the summer.

Mr. Woodruff sent out an invitation to every one in the county, to celebrate the Fourth of July at the Grove. He brought up from Detroit such articles for the dinner as were considered necessary, and could not be found in the settlement. Among these were loaf-sugar, cheese, raisins, rice, and last, but not least, a half barrel of whisky.

Mrs. Woodruff's oven was the only one in the place. It was built out of doors, of stone, plastered with mud. Here the baking was done. All joined in the work of preparation. A beef was killed, and when the meat was ready to roast, lo! the oven and every bake kettle were already full. Logs were rolled together and a fire quickly made out of doors. Two large kettles were turned on the side before this fire, and on sticks laid in these the meat was roasted to perfection. The company gathered in Mr. Woodruff's yard where a log had been set up to resemble a cannon; on this the boys fired their rifles and ushered in the day with wonderful salutes. From a stump near by, Mr. Woodruff read the Declaration of Independence and made a speech. Then all who could sing joined in singing "Hail Columbia," and we were ready for dinner. Our table was made of rough boards, covered with the whitest and smoothest of home-made linen. We were all proud of our success in preparing the dinner, and it certainly was very inviting. There were roast beef and chickens; new potatoes, green peas and beets; warm biscuits with butter and honey; cheese; rice puddings and loaf cake, both well filled with raisins. The following are the names of those who partook of the dinner, as nearly as I can remember: Mr. Woodruff and family; Mr. Grant and family; Mr. Hiram Tuttle and family; Mr. John Bryan and family; Judge Fleming; Arden H. Ballard; Thomas Sackrider; Mr. Stiles; Mr. David McCorel; Sanders Beverly; Mr. Leonard Miller; Captain Phair; Mr. Stoddard; Orange Crane; Mr. Mayhey; Mr. Ecklor, and Mr Harwood.

The dinner passed off well, and Delia Woodruff and I had the hot sling ready for toasts. This was new work for us and we forgot our instructions and put in a double portion of whisky. The effect of this mistake was soon apparent on the toast drinkers, in increased liveliness and good humor. Everything passed off pleasantly, and in the afternoon we were joined by Mr. Mallett and his sister, from Brownstown. Mr. M. was the fiddler, and we had a lively dance in the evening, being joined by others who had not been present at the dinner. Harmony and good fellowship reigned throughout the day, and it was a time long to be remembered by those present.

Death visited the settlement that summer for the first time, and cast a gloom over every heart. A young Irishman named Oakman, who had come to the place with John Phillips, was taken sick and lived but a short time. Chills and fever now commenced and some families were not able to do anything for themselves. Mrs. Woodruff made a large kettle of porridge every day and sent me with it to those who were sick. The supplies brought with us were divided with those whom sickness had made destitute, and were soon exhausted. Money was scarce, and we now began to see hard fare. The corn yielded well, but there was no way to grind it. Hulled corn was our staple for a long time. Those who had been able to work had made gardens and raised plenty of turnips and some beans and potatoes. In the winter, mortars were made by burning a hollow in the top of stumps, where the corn was placed and pounded with a pestle fastened to a pole which worked like a well sweep. The fine and coarse parts of the pounded corn were carefully separated, the fine used for bread, the coarse for samp. Mr. Cross and Mr. Grant had each sowed a piece of wheat, and after harvest we had pounded wheat, which was quite a welcome change. The cold weather abated the sickness, and we beguiled the long winter evenings by meeting together at the different houses to dance, sing and play. This was enjoyed by old and young, and was an excellent preventive of homesickness, a disease we carefully guarded against. Work again progressed, fields were cleared and fenced, door yards enclosed, and by spring Mr. Rawson had a saw-mill running at the landing (now Rawsonville). The surrounding country was rapidly settled; wild animals were not so numerous. In the fall of 1825 I returned to Ohio, and was absent from Michigan about two years.

It might be mentioned that from the time of our coming to Michigan we had no religious meetings of any kind. It was Mrs. Grant's custom to gather in all the younger people of the place on the Sabbath and read to them out of the Bible, and teach them to sing and spell.

An incident occurred at Mr. Woodruff's that served as a standing joke. Mr. Ballard and Judge Fleming were about retiring for the night, when they heard a terrible noise, and supposed that some wild animal was about to spring upon them through the window. They quickly dressed, and pale and trembling hastened to Mr. Woodruff's room, only to learn that they had been frightened by a screech owl.

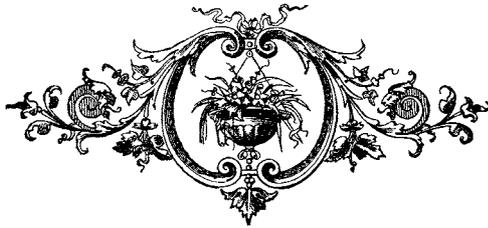

After Mr. Grant went on to his farm he made maple sugar, and a party of us, all girls, in sugaring off, set fire to the woods. Rails were burned and much damage done. It was always spoken of as the Indian fire. We kept our own counsel and no one knew that we caused it.

I returned from Ohio again to Michigan in 1827, was married to Alvin Cross in the autumn of 1828, and moved on the farm where I now reside, on section 14, township of Ypsilanti, in 1829. Mr. Cross died the 18th of February, 1875. Mr. and Mrs. Woodruff died in Ypsilanti over 40 years ago. Mr. and Mrs. Tuttle lived upon the farm that he purchased in 1823, on section 23, until their deaths. Mr. Tuttle died — — —, and Mrs. Tuttle died six or seven years ago. Mr. Grant, after living on his farm purchased in 1823, on section 15, Ypsilanti, some eight years, sold it to Edward Phelps and removed to Indiana, and soon after Mr. and Mrs. Grant both died. The first burial service at the Grove was that of Mr. Oakman; there was no one present to offer a prayer; Mrs. Grant read a chapter in the Bible, and after singing a hymn he was buried. Rev. John Baughman preached the first sermon at the Grove at the house of Mr. Brooks, in the year of 1825. The first grist-mill built in the county was by Major Woodruff, about half a mile down the Huron river from the Grove. It was built of hewn logs; the building was some 20x30 feet square, and he commenced running the mill in the fall of 1825, and it was a day of rejoicing among the settlers, having had a hard time previous to this to prepare their corn fit for use. The year of 1825 could truly be called hard times, as there was no store near them, and if there had been, the inhabitants of the Grove and vicinity had nothing to buy with, and consequently had to go without many of the necessaries of life, to say nothing of the luxuries that the present generation now enjoy.

CHAPTER XVI.

AUTHORS AND ARTISTS.

In the world of letters and in the world of art, Washtenaw county presents the names of some who have attained more than a national reputation. In the world of letters the names of Watson, Cooley, Angell, Cocker, Williams, Palmer, Franklin, Frothingham, and Winchell are known wherever the English language is read. Randolph Rogers is famous as a sculptor the world over. There are many others, known, perhaps, to but a few, whose contributions deserve a place in the literature of the country, who, from innate modesty, will probably never be known. In this connection it is proposed to present the names, accompanied by short sketches, and now and then selections from their works, of some who are well known in the community in which they reside and who have some reputation abroad. There are doubtless many others equally meritorious with those mentioned. They are only omitted from the fact that the attention of the historian has not been called to them.

PROF. JAMES C. WATSON.

Prof. Watson, a biographical sketch of whom is given under the head of "Some of Washtenaw County's Illustrious Dead," was the author of a number of scientific works, among which were a "Popular Treatise on Comets," published in Philadelphia in 1860, "Theoretical Astronomy," published in Philadelphia and London in 1868, and which has since been the standard work on the subject. It was this work which won for him the degree of Ph. D., which was conferred upon him by Leipsic University. He was also the author of a "Report on Horological Instruments," and of "Tables for the Calculation of Simple and Compound Interest and Discount," the latter having been published in Ann Arbor. He was also a frequent contributor to astronomical, educational, and scientific journals. Among others, to Gould's Astronomical Journal, Brunnow's Astronomical Notices, American Journal of Science and Arts, Reports of the United States Coast Survey, The Michigan Journal of Education, The Horological Journal, Monthly Notices of the Royal Astronomical Society (London), Astronomische Nachrichten, Germany; Comptes Rendus de l'Academie des Sciences, Paris Bulletin, International de l'Association, Scientifique de France, Memorie della Societa degli Spettroscoapisti Italiani, (Palermo).

ALEXANDER WINCHELL, LL. D.

One of the most widely known authors, and one whose works have been more extensively read than any other citizen of Washtenaw county, is Prof. Alexander Winchell, of the Michigan University. For a period of 31 years he has constantly been giving to the public the results of his studies and observations, the catalogue now reaching 139 published volumes and pamphlets. Prof. Winchell has devoted his life to scientific pursuits, and his writings show the thorough scholar, the great thinker, and the independent reasoner. His thoughts are clothed in language pleasing to the ear, but strongly written. One of Prof. Winchell's best known works, at least among general readers, is that entitled "Reconciliation of Science and Religion," published by Harper & Bros., in 1877. Of this work the New York Tribune says: "Without dwelling on other points discussed in this suggestive volume, we may venture to thank the author for an original and fruitful contribution to the questions which now engage the attention of so many of the profoundest thinkers of the day. This work is of a critical character, commenting freely on opinions and systems which have found a place in the history of philosophy; but it also presents the mature points of independent research and reflection. It betrays an intimate acquaintance with the development of thought in the best ages of scientific culture; but its principles are not the result of sympathy and adoption. The author acknowledges no man as his master; he admits no conclusions which he has not made his own by processes of thought and study similar to those in which they had their origin. The materials which he has obtained by scholarly labors, have been thoroughly fused in his own mind, and are reproduced in forms which bear its image and superscription. He is evidently embarrassed by the fertility of his conceptions. * * * The rare intellectual fairness which marks the volume, is a feature of no less interest than the philosophical ability with which its discussions are conducted." The Northern Christian Advocate says of the same work: "We do not remember ever to have read a work which more impressed us. It is a book for the believer and the doubter, for the student and the theologian. It is both comforting and disquieting. It solves some difficult problems, and in this time of perplexity and mental conflict every helpful utterance should be heeded. It is not a belligerent work, but a thoughtful and explanatory one. It is a reconciler. As a matter of style it is gracefully but strongly written. Exhibiting a wide acquaintance with ancient and modern forms of thought, it is never dry or obscure. The book is full of thought; it is a noble contribution to American literature."

On the 27th of April, 1880, the first edition was given to the public of a new work entitled "Pre-adamites, or the Demonstration of the Existence of Men before Adam; together with a study of their condition, antiquity, racial affinities and progressive dispersions over the earth." This work is an octavo of 500 pages, and published by S. C. Griggs & Co., Chicago. As a literary production, this work was received with universal favor. As to the positions assumed, it is noteworthy that most of the religious journals either occupied a non-committal attitude, saying time was required for due consideration, or they dogmatically condemned the doctrines of the book. The leading religious journals of the North treated the discussion with most intelligence, and therefore with most tolerance. Some of the religious papers denounced the work, and sometimes the author, without the slightest attention to the tenability of the positions assumed. On the contrary, the secular and scientific journals have reviewed the work in a very favorable manner. The New York Evening Post says of this work: "There has been no work recently published upon the subject which can compare with this in importance. Prof. Winchell's reputation for learning and sincerity, his repute as a student of physical science, and his special attitude toward what is called the conflict between science and religion, render anything which he writes upon such a theme important." The leading papers of the country all review the work.

Among other works written by Prof. Winchell are "Voices from Nature," "On the Origin of the Prairies of the Valley of the Mississippi," "A Plea for Science," "Sketches of Creation," "Grand Conclusions of the Sciences in Reference to the History of Matter and Life," "Religion and Science," "The Geology of the Stars," "The Genealogy of Ships," "The Battle-Fields of Faith," and "The Religious Nature of Savages."

RANDOLPH ROGERS.

Randolph Rogers, "America's famous sculptor," was born in the village of Waterloo, Seneca Co., New York, on the 12th day of July, 1822. When but a small lad, Mr. Rogers' parents moved to Lyons, Wayne Co., in his native State, and six years later, in 1829, to Ann Arbor, Mich. Being the youngest of a family of eight children, Mr. Rogers had not as many educational advantages as the older members of the family, and wishing to make himself useful, in 1835 he entered the bakery of D. W. & C. Bliss, in the city of Ann Arbor, where he worked as an apprentice for three or four years. While in this business, the wonderful genius which afterward made him so famous began to be shown in the rude works of art made in the leisure hours he had at his command. When he was not busy he often would take a piece of dough and fashion it in such a form and shape as to correctly represent some of God's finest handiwork. Also at leisure hours he directed his attention to drawing and sketching, and became quite proficient in that line of art. After serving his time as an apprentice in the bakery, he turned his thoughts to the dry-goods trade and obtained a position with Gen. J. D. Hill, then one of the most prominent merchants of Ann Arbor. After remaining with his new employer for some time he concluded to visit New York city, and, if possible, find some work there which would keep him comfortably, and yet give him plenty of spare time to pursue his long-cherished ambition of making himself famous in the pursuit of art. He secured a situation in the silk house of John Stuart, Jr., in the year 1848, when but 26 years of age.

While engaged in this branch of business, Mr. Rogers conceived the idea of putting his genius into active account, and concluded to make a marble bust of some prominent person. He selected a subject, and by hard work, toiling many an hour after his day's labor was finished, and sometimes far into the night, he finished his production. It was a full and perfect marble bust of the famous Lord Byron. His employer happened to see this piece of work, when the author was out. Upon his return, Mr. Stuart asked him who had produced the wonderful imitation of the famous poet. Mr. Rogers humbly replied, that he was the author. Mr. Stuart's surprise at this declaration was unbounded, but when he found expression, he asked Randolph if he desired to proceed to Europe and put himself under the tuition of some of the master artists. Mr. Rogers replied that he would be most happy to do so, but his present financial resources would not admit of such an extended drain as this would naturally subject them to. Mr. Stuart then told him that if he wished to go, he would advance him such funds as would be required, and when he got so proficient with his mallet and chisel as to make his calling remunerative he could pay back the loan. Mr. Rogers was very grateful for this kind offer, after reflecting, concluded to accept it.

He left New York in 1848, after being there less than one year, and sailed for Florence, Italy, where he arrived in safety, and immediately placed himself under one of the leading sculptors of that renowned city. He studied hard and patiently for some time, but thinking he could improve his genius and obtain better advantages and facilities for his work by being alone, he opened an humble studio for himself, and here toiled earnestly, early and late, to perfect the art which in the near future should bring him rich returns.

After laboring in Florence for nearly six years, he returned to his native land. His residence abroad had enabled him to accomplish much, and the future seemed full of rare promise. He had been successful, in a financial point of view, in the old country, and was able to repay his generous benefactor, and to have about $6,000 left. He was now recognized, both at home and abroad, as an artist of no small ability; even his brother artists in the old world fully acknowledged his genius in the art.

After remaining but a short time in his native land, he returned to Italy, this time to the center of art, the Imperial city, Rome, where he has since resided, with the exception of a few short intervals of absence in this country. He has crossed and recrossed the ocean a dozen or more times. He prefers sunny Italy even to his own native land. He loves its history, its romance, but above all, he loves it because it is the home of art.

Among Mr. Rogers' works may be mentioned the following: A statue of John Adams, in Mount Auburn cemetery, Boston; a colossal bronze statue of Lincoln, unveiled in Philadelphia in 1871; a statue for the Colt family monument in Hartford, Conn., called the "Angel of the Resurrection," [and an allegorical figure of the "Lost Pleiad," made expressly for a resident of San Francisco. He has produced a magnificent work in the statue of "Nydia," a character taken from Bulwer's "Last Days of Pompeii," of which he has made several duplicates. Other creations are the ideal statues of "Ruth" and "Isaac." The original production of "Nydia" and "Ruth" are in the art museum of Michigan University. For several years he was occupied in completing the designs for the Washington monument at Richmond, Virginia, begun by the celebrated artist, Crawford. Since the rebellion he has designed and executed memorial monuments for Rhode Island and Michigan, besides several other prominent States. The one in Providence, unveiled in 1871, is some 50 feet in height, and is crowned with a statue of "America." This latter is 10 feet high. On the angles of the pedestal are statues seven feet high representing the four branches of the service. The monument in Detroit, erected on the Campus Martius, is similar in design to the former, though larger and much more elaborate. It is surmounted by a statue of "Michigan."

Perhaps an achievement giving Mr. Rogers as much genuine publicity as anything from his hand, is the bronze door for the eastern entrance to the rotunda of the national capitol. This work was designed and modeled in Rome during the year 1858, and cast at the Royal Foundry at Munich. It was finished in 1861. Its entire weight is 20,000 pounds, and cost over $30,000. This work—a master-piece in every sense—is 17 feet high and nine feet wide, and is divided into eight panels, each representing in alto-relievo some scene in the career of Columbus. Between the panels, and on the sides, are 16 statuettes representing the eminent contemporaries of the great discoverer. It is a work which has called forth the admiration of the world. The frieze on the Lincoln monument at Springfield, Ills., was also executed by this master artist. A bust of his daughter—a production of his art—was on exhibition at Paris during the Exposition.

A few years since, Mr. Rogers received the appointment of professor of St. Luke's Academy of Fine Arts, in Rome. In all his work there is an impersonation of dignity and grace. Nothing is left incomplete, but everything to the minutest detail shows the touch of a real master.

In personal appearance, Mr. Rogers is about five feet ten inches high, and weighs nearly 200 pounds. His forehead is broad and massive, and shows the wealth of intellect and genius. His former employers of Ann Arbor, and particularly Dr. Calvin Bliss, one of the proprietors of the bakery wherein he worked, say he was the very soul of honor and integrity in everything, but little did they think at that time to be giving employment to a boy, who in future years would astonish the world with his natural genius.

MISS KATIE J. ROGERS.

Miss Katie J. Rogers, an artist of more than ordinary ability, was born in Ann Arbor, and was educated in the public schools of that city, graduating at the high school in 1869. At quite an early age she exhibited a talent for painting, which was encouraged by her parents. Desiring to become proficient in the art she resolved to attend some good school of design, and made choice of the Chicago Academy of Design, and placed herself under the tuition of Prof. Gookins, a graduate of the Munich School of Art, and one of the most skillful artists in his line, that of portrait-painting. Miss Rogers remained in this institution for some time, and in 1876 graduated the first of a class of 16. The last production of her art in that place was a full-sized portrait of a Venetian page of the fourteenth century. This picture was executed by Miss Rogers with great rapidity and while the other members of her class were making only a half-length portrait. Prof. Gookins was so well pleased with his pupil's work, that he insisted she should let it be placed on exhibition at the Centennial. Miss Rogers, being of a retired and modest disposition, kindly refused, and the portrait which, undoubtedly, would have attracted attention even among the many fine works that adorned the walls in the Art Hall, is now hanging in the studio of Miss Rogers in Ann Arbor.

After graduation, Miss Rogers returned to her home in Ann Arbor and opened a studio, since which time she has painted many portraits and landscapes which show the touch of a true artist. She has made a specialty of portrait-painting, and excels in this line of art. Every portrait from her easel has been life-like and striking. Whether painting the soft dimple upon the cheek of the innocent babe, or the harder lines of the aged pioneer, there seems to be a reality about the work which makes one feel that he is in a living presence.

Among the portraits executed by Miss Rogers may be mentioned the following: Randolph Rogers, the famous sculptor, and an uncle of the artist, a very finely executed work, and considered the most natural of any ever painted; one of Moses Rogers, the father of the artist, and a very striking likeness; one of Mr. Sweetland, Lodi township; one of Judge Kingsley, very nicely executed; one of Squire Leland, of Ann Arbor; a full-sized portrait of Eddie Lawrence, son of Judge Lawrence, of Ann Arbor; a portrait of Mrs. J. M. Bailey, wife of the editor of the Ann Arbor Argus.

Miss Rogers has also finished a portrait of Prof. DuPont's child, and two or three fine pieces for ex-Gov. Alpheus Felch, both of Michigan University. One of Miss Rogers' most admired pictures is that of a small babe of some two months, lying on a snowy pillow of down. In looking at this faithful representation of the crowning glory of the Heavenly Father, and noticing the little dimples, which almost seem to come and go, with the little hands raised as if in supplication to the Father of mercies, one can readily fancy the soft cooing of its melodious voice as heard. Miss Rogers, indeed, shows wonderful genius in this painting. In fact, the whole soul of the artist is in all her work, and whatever she does is well done.

EZRA D. SEAMAN.

A full biographical sketch of Mr. Seaman will be found in another part of this work. In this connection his literary work only is spoken of. Mr. Seaman's first work was entitled "Essays on the Progress of Nations," and passed through several editions. In 1870 appeared "The American System of Government." The author, in his preface, states that he had been a close observer of the workings of our system of Government for 40 years, and in the work gave the results of his observations. The New York Observer says of this work: "The scope of the work is well indicated by its title. It presents a mass of information, valuable in itself, and such as should be possessed by every American citizen. The author's views are generally sound and well considered. The book is comprehensive in its plan, and indicates careful and honest reflection." The New York Evening Post says: "Mr. Seaman writes vigorously, and has decided opinions—one of these being that an elective judiciary is a mistake, and another that women are much better out of politics. His ability has been established by former essays, which have been highly and widely praised, and the present volume is likely to attract a large share of attention." Of Mr. Seaman's first work the New York Tribune says: "The work will be readily understood by any one, and no one can read it without acquiring broader and juster views of National policy, and a wise public economy." The third work of Mr. Seaman, to which reference is here made, is "Views of Nature, and of the Elements, Forces and Phenomena of Nature, and of Mind." This work appeared in 1873, from the press of Scribner, Armstrong & Co. Like his other works, this is written in a vigorous style which at once arrests the attention of the reader, and convinces him that the author thoroughly believes in the views presented.

THOMAS M. COOLEY, LL. D.

Thomas M. Cooley, Professor in the Law Department of Michigan University, is well known as an author of legal works. In 1868, he published his "Treatise on Constitutional Limitations," his first work. His catalogue now consists, in addition to the work mentioned, "Treatise on the Law of Taxation," "Treatise on the Law of Torts," an edition of "Blackstone's Commentary," of "Strong on the Constitution," and of "Harrington's Chancery Reports." Judge was the editor of the law articles in the revised edition of the "American Encyclopedia," and has also largely written for reviews and magazines.

B. F. COCKER, D. D., LL. D.

An author of note, one whose works have been read by the most intelligent men in the land, is B. F. Cocker, Professor of Mental and Moral Philosophy in Michigan University. "Christianity and Greek Philosophy" was given to the public in 1870, and well received by critics and readers. In his preface, Dr. Cocker says: "The central and unifying thought of this volume is that the necessary ideas and laws of the reason, and the native instincts of the human heart, originally implanted by God, are the primal and germinal forces of history; and that these have been developed under conditions which were first ordained and have been continually supervised by the Providence of God." Prof. Winchell says of this work: "It is a brave defense of the fundamental truths of Christianity. It is a grammar of religious thought, illustrated by citations from Grecian thinkers. It is an attempt to introduce to personal consciousness the axioms of religious philosophy, and familiarize it with their characteristics and implications."

"The Theistic Conception of the World" is, perhaps, Dr. Cocker's best work. In it he gives the results of years of investigation and thought. He fully considers every position of a class of self-styled "advanced thinkers" of what they have been pleased to call "the tendency of modern thought." The issue is now sharply and clearly defined between a God and no God, and in this work the author defends in a masterly way the existence of a Divine Being.

"Hand-Book of Philosophy," and "Lectures on the Truth of the Christian Religion," are also works of Dr. Cocker, and have met with favorable reception.

Dr. Cocker has for many years been a contributor to the various reviews and magazines of the country, and has done much in strengthening believers in the revealed will of God and in the Christian religion.

EDWARD OLNEY, LL. D.

Prof. Edward Olney, author of Olney's Mathematical Series, and Professor of Mathematics in the University of Michigan, is worthy of a place, not only among the authors of Washtenaw county, but of the world. The first of his series of mathematics was published in 1870 by Sheldon & Co., of New York. The favor with which this work was received encouraged the author to continue his labors, resulting in the compilation and publication of a series of 15 books, in parts, or eight complete works, as follows: "First Lessons in Arithmetic," "Practical Arithmetic," "Science of Arithmetic," "Introduction to Algebra," "Complete School Algebra," "University Algebra," "Elements of Geometry," and "General (Analytical) Geometry and Calculus." No series of mathematics ever came into such general use in so short a time. They have been introduced and are in use in nearly every leading college and university in the Union, including, Yale, Harvard, Bowdoin, Dartmouth, Cornell, Washington and Lee University, Michigan University and others. In this course, the whole subject of pure mathematics is sharply outlined according to the best modern philosophical views, and the exact province of each separate branch is clearly shown in general statement, and in the details of execution is closely adhered to. The adaptation is such as to make the pupil feel, at every step of his progress, that he is required to reason, not merely to perform certain operations. Intelligent and unbiased critics and educational men pronounce this the most complete mathematical series ever issued.

Prof. Olney does not confine his literary labor alone to mathematics, but is a frequent contributor to the religious, educational and literary magazines and reviews of the country. He has been for many years assistant editor of the Christian Herald, published at Kalamazoo, and has since 1870 prepared the Sunday-School lessons for that periodical, requiring much study and examination, not only of the Bible, but the religious literature of the world. The Professor was also, at one time, associated in the publication of the Educational Weekly, in Chicago.

DONALD MACLEAN, M. D.

Dr. Maclean is Professor of ——— in Michigan University. The first literary work of the Doctor was that of editing "Symes' Medical Works," published in 1865, by J. B. Lippincott & Co., of Philadelphia. This work was, at the request of Dr. Symes himself, and met with a favorable reception from both critics and readers. It has passed through several editions and is recognized as a standard work by the medical profession. The Doctor is the author of numerous articles in our current medical literature, and has delivered many addresses before medical societies.

A. B. PALMER, A. M., M. D.

Dr. Palmer, Professor of Pathology, Practice of Medicine and Hygiene in the University of Michigan, as an author is well known, especially among the medical fraternity. Numerous reports and addresses have, from time to time, appeared in pamphlet form, of which the Professor was the author, and which have been well received by those interested in everything pertaining to the science of medicine. In 1865 appeared "A Report upon the Epidemic occurring at Maplewood Young Ladies' Institute, Pittsfield, Mass. including a discussion on the causes of Typhoid Fever." During the same year appeared "A Lecture on Sanitary Science: Its Importance as a Branch of General Education." This address was published by the class in Michigan University before whom it was delivered. In 1866, "Epidemic Cholera: Its Pathology and Treatment," appeared from the pen of Prof. Palmer. "Dry Earth as a means of Disposal of Excreta," was published in 1870. "Law and Intelligence in Nature and the Improvement of the Race in accordance with Law," appeared in 1873. "The New Departure in Medical Teaching in the University of Michigan," in 1877. "Quinine in Acute Pneumonia," in 1879. In 1880, appeared the Doctor's most pretentious work, "A Review of Homeopathy." This work was favorably received by the medical fraternity of all schools, save the Homeopaths, whose position it combats. Prof. Palmer is now (in the spring of 1881) engaged in the preparation of an elaborate work on the general practice of medicine, which will embody the experience of a long and busy life.

EDWARD C. FRANKLIN, M. D.

Dr. Franklin, Professor of Surgery in the Homeopathic Medical College, Michigan University, is the author of a number of standard medical works. In 1864 he wrote a work on the "Principles of Surgery and the Treatment of Surgical Diseases," 874 pages, which met with a favorable reception. In 1874, the "Art of Surgery," a work devoted to operative surgery in its various branches, showing the various methods of operating in surgical disorders requiring interference, 870 pages. In 1877, he wrote a monograph on "Spinal Curvature and Deformities," showing the beneficial results of the new treatment by the plaster jacket and artificial spine. Dr. Franklin has also written monographs on "Cancer," "Heart Diseases," "Diseases of Bones," "Tumors," "Formation and Union of Bones," "Operations on the Head from Injury," "Homeopathy in the Army," "Transfusion of Blood," "Anomalous Fractures," "Amputation from Gun-shot Wounds," and many other subjects of professional interest. Dr. Franklin has been elected President of the American Institute of Homeopathy, of the Western Academy, and Mission Institute. He has, on account of his many valuable contributions to medical literature, been elected honorary member of more than a dozen State Medical Societies, and a half dozen other societies of medicine.

PROF. C. L. FORD.

Prof. Ford is the author of "Questions on Anatomy, Histology and Physiology," "Questions on Teeth," and "Chart of the Muscles in the Human Body." The design of these works is to aid the student in acquiring a knowledge of the subjects treated. No answers are given in the works to the questions, it being expected of the student he should search out the knowledge from the various works on the given subjects.

CLARA DOTY BATES.

This lady is a daughter of Samuel R. Doty, and was born in Ann Arbor. At an early age she evinced a poetic talent, which found vent in the publication of some beautiful gems in the various papers and magazines of the country. Prior to 1860, Graham's Magazine was considered one of the best literary magazines of the country, and one of its most valued contributors was Mrs. Bates, then Miss Clara Doty. The following comments and quotations are from that magazine in 1858:

There is no young writer of poetry at present before our public whose lyrics are more decidedly characteristic than those of Miss Clara Doty, of Ann Arbor, Michigan. If the reader will imagine a clear, yet sensitive mind, which has perfectly appreciated the purest and most sparkling flashes of German poetry, in the deepest and sweetest lyrics of Heine, and which has then, forgetting all models, studied nature, retaining no more of art than is found in our Indian legends, he will have an accurate idea of the impression which her songs convey. There are many sweet little poems of the present day which look like Clara Doty's, but hers have the peculiarity that they are based on a deep, generally a semi-mythologic, thought. They are never rococo. Take for instance the following:

WHITE VIOLETS.

A star fell from the sky at night,
Through the dim stillness of the blue,
And sank, a transient gleam of white,
Where beds of early violets grew.

It left no vacant place on high,
It gave to earth no added light;
But flowers, of color like the sky,
Were changed into a starry white.

With another poet, we should call this a pretty figure; with Clara Doty, it is something deeper. Ever-changing nature, its waving, glittering forms, ever sinking themselves in each other's natures, beautiful transmigrations, dying in beauty, and reappearing in other beautiful forms an eternal symbolism of life,—all of this we find in her poetry, quiet and modest as it is. It is never set forth,—all her lyrics are eminently simple and unassuming,—but it is there. Less marked, but not the less there, we find the same blending of symbols in the following fantasy:

Gold-ribbed, and silken-sailed, from rose to rose,
With honey laden, fairy wild bees break
The currents of the air with steady prows,
Leaving a surge of humming in their wake.

The wind sways with its music all the trees,
Whose leafy whispers make the bird-hearts beat;
While soft cloud-fleets sail heaven's azure seas,
Vast phantom navies ride the billowy wheat,

The fishes stirring in the water clear
Bind nets of sunlight on their golden scales;
The water lilies ride at anchor near,
With sides of shining green and waxen sails

I hear no tiny mermen's laughter sweet,
Sporting the swaying water-weeds among,
But in the rushing brook are sounds of feet,
Quick beat of drums, and shouts of merry song.

With click of many a pebble castanet,
As in an eager multitude, they flee,
Through the pure freshness of the rivulet,
On to the bitter, million-peopled sea.

Plato's argument for the immortality of the soul is no stronger than the one of eternally beautiful, ever-reviving nature—the oldest and most beautiful of all—yet ever new and fresh and lovely, as Clara Doty shows in the following, where, as in everything else which she writes, lies a deep and delicate mystery:

RESURGAM.

If I could die when all the flowers died,
Be buried with them when the autumn rain
Beats out the rose's last red flush of pride,
And stains the late fresh greenness of the plain,

Oh, then it seems that as the buried seed,
Calm I might sleep through Winter's chilly reign,
And when the merry Spring his captives freed,
Throw off the sod, and look on earth again.

I cannot sleep an everlasting sleep,
I cannot have the earth for ages bloom
With flowers and forests, and be buried deep,
My eyes and heart in dust, within a tomb.

With the fair violets and the cypress flowers,
With the sweet roses planted over me,
My dust shall spring in warm sunshine and showers,
And as a flower I shall live and see.

Time has not dimmed the lustre of Mrs. Bates. The same poetic genius that was shown in youth, has developed as the years have flown. The following quotations are from her pen of a late date:

DARK DAYS AND FAIR.

One day goes clouded to its close,
At setting, d'all as when it rose;
Another has the sunny blue
Arched over it from dew to dew;
More have their mingled phases;—rare
The wholly dark or wholly fair.

So lives their little orbits run,
Either in shadow or in sun;
This glad one noon-day tempests smite;
This sad one evening glories light
With unexpected radiance;—rare
The wholly dark or wholly fair.

But Faith has wings for any sky!
Send her abroad her powers to try
When th' uplifting airs are warm,
That, should her flight encounter storm,
With trial made strong, her wings may dare
Boldly alike the dark and fair.

Secure the soul that rests on Faith!
 Upborne as by an animate breath,
 She soars beyond earth's loss and gloom,
 Beyond the shadow of the tomb,
 With rapture, where is Heaven's free air
 Wholly unclouded, wholly fair!

GRANDMOTHER'S BIRTHDAY.

BY CLARA DOTY BATES.

Just seventy years ago
 A little baby smiled,
 And they gave the sweet old Bible name
 Of Hannah to the child.

She slept, no doubt, such sleep
 As only falls on eyes
 That still have shut within their lids
 The light of paradise.

No doubt the little hands
 Lay passive on her breast,
 As, with the cradle's lullaby,
 She hushed her to her rest.

Ah me! who could foretell
 What work those hands should do?
 How many they should help to lead
 Life's troubled mazes through?

What never-faltering part
 Their tender strength should take;
 What burdens for the tired ones bear,
 What barriers help to break?

And ah! who could foresee
 Upon that baby brow,
 Where lay the dark and silky locks,
 Its crown of silver now?

Peace, as at first, is there;
 The world has never set
 One single line of its hard seal
 Upon that forehead yet!

The constant shadow of pain
 Has dimmed perhaps the eyes;
 Yet still they hold within their lids
 The light of paradise.

Just seventy years ago
 Since the little baby came,
 And now her children's children bless
 That sweet old Bible name.

Of late years Mrs. Bates has given much attention to the preparation of juvenile literature. The firm of D. Lothrop & Co., Boston, have issued from her pen "Classics of Baby Land," "Collections of Nursery Tales, versified for Little Folks," and "Heart's Content," a story for older children. E. B. Smith & Co., Detroit, issued "Songs for Gold Locks," illustrated by Mrs. Finley, of that city, a sister of Mrs. Bates.

REV. MARTIN L. D'OOGE, PH. D.,

Professor of Greek Language and Literature, in the University of Michigan, is a regular contributor to the "Transactions of the American Philological Society," and to the "American Journal of Philology." In 1875 he published an edition of "Demosthenes on the Crown."

MRS. CHARLOTTE FINLEY.

Mrs. Finley is the fourth daughter of Samuel R. Doty, of Ann Arbor. She has attained quite a reputation as an artist, her crayon work being especially fine. A portrait of her father, and also of her mother, are especially admired. Mrs. Finley has done a large amount of work in illustrating children's papers and magazines. The illustrations in a juvenile work by Mrs. Clara Doty Bates, entitled "Songs for Gold Locks," are from her pencil.

PROF. GABRIEL CAMPBELL.

The principal work of Prof. Campbell is that of a "New German Course, or Grammar," published in 1867. He is also the author of a sermon on "Future Retribution," which received favorable notice, and a poem entitled "War Pictures," published in 1865.

CHAPTER XVII.

PIONEER ASSOCIATION.

The young live in the future, the middle-aged in the present, and the old in the past. The youth looks forward with bright anticipations, believing he can grapple successfully with the problems of life, and that his name will be enrolled among the famous in the world's history; those in the prime of life feel that everything with them is the living present; the aged person sits by the fire and dreams of the past, when he was strong of limb, with undimmed eye, fighting his way through life, and overcoming every obstacle placed in his path. It is with him a glorious thought, that he has come off conqueror in life's battle.

The memories of the past recall to the minds of the pioneers those who were associated with them in the work of building up waste places, and where there has been a co-partnership of suffering and endurance, the feelings of kinship and fellowship spring up, and there is a drawing together. This feeling has resulted in the formation of the various State, county and township pioneer societies now in existence.

In response to a call issued by Gen. Edward Clark, President of the Ann Arbor Pioneer and Historical Society, some 15 or 20 of the old settlers and pioneers of the county assembled at the courthouse, Saturday morning, Aug. 16, 1873, at 10:30 o'clock, for the purpose of organizing a county pioneer society.

The meeting was called to order by Gen. Clark, who stated its object, and suggested that in order to obtain the early history of the county, it would be necessary to take immediate steps, ere those who had assisted in making the history were laid in their graves, and had become traditional.

Gen. Clark and M. H. Goodrich, Esq., of Ann Arbor, were appointed temporary Chairman and Secretary, respectively.

Gen. G. D. Hill made a few remarks relative to the object of the society, and as to co-operation with the State society. Committees of five on Permanent Organization, and three on Constitution and By-laws, were appointed as follows:

Permanent Organization.—J. Q. A. Sessions, Ann Arbor; C. H. Wines, Sylvan; Calvin Wheeler, Salem; James Davidson, Sylvan.

Constitution and By-laws.—M. H. Goodrich, Ann Arbor; John Geddes, Ann Arbor; William A. Jones, Dexter.

After adjournment and reassembling in the p. m., a constitution and by-laws were adopted, and the society named "The Pioneer Society of the County Washtenaw."

The following permanent officers were duly elected:

Thomas Holmes.

President.—Ex-Governor Alpheus Felch, Ann Arbor.

Vice-Presidents.—E. Clark, Ann Arbor city; John Geddes, Ann Arbor town; A. Childs, Augusta; D. W. Palmer, Bridgewater; William Jones, Dexter; E. Haire, Freedom; Darius Pierce, Lima; C. H. Wines, Sylvan; William M. Gregory, Saline; James H. Fellows, Sharon; A. D. Crane, Scio; Allen Crittendon, Pittsfield; John Peebles, Salem; B. Case, Manchester; J. R. Arms, Webster; J. D. Pierce, Ypsilanti city; E. D. Lay, Ypsilanti town; Peter Cook, York; Lyman Wood, Lodi; George Gale, Superior; Joseph Pray, Northfield.

Secretary.—George S. Wheeler, Salem.

The following constitution was adopted :

SEC. 12. This constitution may be altered or amended at any annual meeting by a majority vote of all the members of the society, but any alteration or amendment shall be proposed, at least, at one regular meeting previous to action being taken thereon.

J. Q. A. Sessions read a paper prepared by Jonathan Morton, entitled "The First Settlement of Ypsilanti," which was highly appreciated by those present.

The second quarterly meeting of the society was held at the court-house in Ann Arbor, Oct. 6, 1873, Hon. Alpheus Felch in the chair.

Gen. Edward Clark, of Ann Arbor, read a paper entitled "An Indian Scare," which caused some amusement and several confessions from those participating in the scare.

Ex-Gov. Felch spoke upon the subject of the Toledo war. Lorenzo Davis next entertained the society for about three-quarters of an hour in narrating in a humorous manner many incidents in the settlement of Ypsilanti, wherein it appears he was engaged in three wars,—the Toledo, the Cholera and the Black Hawk wars, in which he rose from a humble citizen in the private walks of life to the position of 4th Corporal, and in the celebrated attack on the village of Ypsilanti, in the Cholera war, actually saw two stage horses mortally wounded.

William M. Gregory read a paper in which he urged upon all the importance of perpetuating the labors of the pioneers.

The third meeting was held Dec. 1, 1873, at the Firemen's hall in Ann Arbor.

Alvin Cross, of Ypsilanti, presented a paper which was read by Lorenzo Davis, entitled "My Introduction to Michigan."

John Geddes, of Ann Arbor township, also read a paper in which he narrated his experience in coming to and settling in Washtenaw county.

Letters were read, and ordered to be spread upon the records of the society between the Greek Minister and the Mayor of Ypsilanti, in reference to the origin of the name of the city of Ypsilanti.

A biographical sketch of Mark Norris was also read and ordered spread upon the records.

The fourth meeting of the society was held Feb. 2, 1874, at Ann Arbor.

On motion of Nathan Webb, of Pittsfield, the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved. That the Pioneer Society hold a festival or picnic in commemoration of the semi-centennial location of the county seat of Washtenaw county, in the city of Ann Arbor, on the 24th day of February, 1874.

A committee of nine persons was appointed to make all necessary arrangements for the festival or picnic, and R. A. Beal, Nathan Webb, William A. Jones, J. Q. A. Sessions, M. H. Goodrich, John J. Robison, Ezra D. Lay, William M. Gregory and C. H. Wines were appointed said committee.

Interesting and instructive papers from Mrs. R. B. Norris, William A. Jones, Morrell Goodrich, William Gregory and John Geddes were read before the meeting.

THE CELEBRATION.

The semi-centennial celebration of the location of Ann Arbor as a county-seat by the Pioneer Society of Washtenaw County, was held in the basement of the Methodist Episcopal church, on Tuesday, Feb. 24, 1874. The opportunity for the fathers and mothers of Washtenaw to meet together and review old acquaintance and rehearse the pleasing memories of bygone days was improved to the fullest extent.

At the time announced for the opening of the festival the parlors of the church were rapidly filled with the pioneers, who had come from every township in the county to do honor to the memory of John Allen and Walter Rumsey, the first pioneers of Washtenaw county. And it was well that they should meet in reunion for their own sakes. The struggles and activities of early life in Michigan, though not without their enjoyable phases, and which, though the sturdy men and women that were represented in the festival have been productive of so much character and real worth among the people and have given to Washtenaw a pre-eminent rank in the counties of the State, deserve to be commemorated and the memory of them handed down to future generations.

The oldest gentleman present on the occasion was Orange Risdon, of Saline. He was early identified with the history of the county and the State, being particularly engaged in the numerous surveys of those days between Detroit and Chicago. Calvin Bliss, who came in 1834, established the first jewelry store in the State west of Detroit. It seems that Calvin Chipman put up the first log house in Ann Arbor, in 1824. He was instrumental in securing the present name of the city. Mr. Rumsey occupied the present site of the Episcopal church, and, as the story goes, his wife, whose name was Ann, said one day to her husband, in reply to his remark, "What a beautiful arbor we have!" "Mr. Rumsey, let's call it Ann's Arbor." Mr. Chipman being present, arose and in the usual form of deliberative assemblies put the vote, which was carried unanimously. The documents to this effect were afterward drawn up and deposited in the office of Major Kearsley, the land agent at Detroit.

Of the antiquities brought out on this occasion, none, perhaps, excited more interest than the first piano ever brought west of Detroit, which was on exhibition in the rear end of the reception hall. From the historical paper which accompanied the same it was learned that it was brought from Detroit in 1827, by John Anderson, with an ox team, for Miss Lucy Ann Clark, and set up at Mr. Harvey Austin's house, which stood on the northwest corner of Second and Liberty streets, where Mr. Anderson was treated to music before leaving. Shortly afterward it was taken to a house standing on Main street. Here large numbers of the Pottawatomies and Tawas Indians enjoyed and frequently danced to its music. This instrument originally cost $75.

Moses Boylan produced some interesting relics of former days in the shape of a family Bible and record bearing the date of 1740, his grandmother's wedding slippers, teaspoons, etc., made in 1765. Mr. Boylan set up in the tailor's trade in 1830, in Ann Arbor, and had at home the shears, pressboard, and other implements of the trade at that time. He had also the oldest jail record in the county. A peculiar incident was related by Mr. Boylan in respect to his son, Arthur E. Boylan, who was born in jail, raised in the poor-house, educated in Michigan University, and was then practicing law in Brighton, Michigan.

Mr. John S. Nowland, who claimed to be the first white child born in Ann Arbor, presented for inspection a needle-case, imported from Scotland 150 years ago; also some scrip of the State of New Jersey, bearing date of 1781.

About three o'clock the pioneers and others in attendance, to the number of 500, sat down to the bountifully laden tables which had been prepared by the ladies of Ann Arbor, with an abundance of everything that could tempt the palates of the epicure. Many compliments were passed on the ladies for their successful efforts in preparing for the wants of the inner man.

The chairman then called for five-minute remarks illustrative of early pioneer life, from the representatives of the various townships. Nearly all called on responded and interested the meeting with the recital of the condition of things in Washtenaw county in its younger days. At the conclusion of the remarks, and after the singing of "Auld Lang Syne," the meeting dissolved, thus ending an occasion which will be remembered by all present as one of the most enjoyable in a social way in the history of the county.

The society again met in convention April 13, 1874, at Firemen's Hall, in Ann Arbor.

At this meeting Charles A. Chapin reported that Mark Howard had generously donated his file of the Western Emigrant to the society. The thanks of the society were tendered Mr. Howard for his excellent gift.

Requests were made of various gentlemen to prepare sketches of the townships in which they lived, and after listening to papers read from E. W. Whitmore, E. D. Lay, Samuel Pettibone and John Thompson the society adjourned to meet on the first Sunday in June.

At the meeting held June 1, 1874, Lorenzo Davis, E. D. Lay, and John Geddes were appointed a committee to take the necessary steps toward organizing under the act to provide for the incorporation of State, county, or municipal biographical and geographical Societies.

A committee consisting of one member of the society from each township and city was appointed to make arrangements for attending the semi-centennial anniversary of the settlement of Ypsilanti. The following named were appointed: Ann Arbor city, Charles A. Chapin; Ann Arbor township, John Geddes; Augusta, Aaron Childs; Bridgewater, David W. Palmer; Dexter, William A. Jones; Manchester, J. D. Corey; Pittsfield, Nathan Webb; Northfield, George Sutton; Lyndon, Osman Clark; Lima, Morrell Goodrich; Lodi, Charles Allmendinger; Saline, William M. Gregory; Salem, George S. Wheeler; Scio, James W. Wing; Sylvan, Charles H. Wines; Sharon, John J. Robison; Superior, S. Cuppen; York, Peter Cook; Ypsilanti township, E. D. Lay; Ypsilanti city, Sidney S. Derby.

On Monday, Aug. 3, 1874, the society met pursuant to adjournment at the court house in Ann Arbor.

An able paper from Mrs. Mark Norris on the early history of Ypsilanti was read by Lorenzo Davis. Horace Carpenter read a paper on the early settlement of the township of Pittsfield, and Charles A. Chapin read a paper prepared by Miss Lizzie Farrand.

On Monday, Sept. 7, 1874, the society met and proceeded to the election of officers for the ensuing year. The following named were elected:

On motion of Lorenzo Davis each member was requested to prepare and present to the society a biographical sketch.

Society adjourned to meet at Ypsilanti, Monday, Dec. 7, 1874.

At the time specified, the society assembled at Bachelder's Hall, Ypsilanti.

Rev. Samuel Clements read an interesting paper on the early history of the township of Lima, for which he received the thanks of the society.

The year 1876 is one long to be remembered, it being the one hundredth anniversary of the nation's birth. Churches, schools, States, counties, towns, villages, all had their histories compiled for future reference.

The pioneers of Washtenaw county were not idle when all around them were busy, and therefore there will be found among their records of that year a large amount of material interesting and valuable to the historian.

The years come and go, and as time passes on the number of the pioneers is being lessened. At every meeting of the society the announcement is made that one or more have passed on to their reward, leaving only the record of a life well spent and good deeds performed. STATE PIONEER SOCIETY.

By invitation of the Washtenaw County Pioneer Society, the annual festival of the Michigan State Pioneer Society was held at Hill's Opera House, in the city of Ann Arbor, June 7, 1876. At 10 o'clock large numbers had assembled, those from the country coming laden with the good things that later in the day were to be served in a sumptuous dinner. At 11 o'clock fully 300 had put in an appearance. The assembly was called to order at this hour by the President of the Washtenaw County Pioneer Society, Gen. Edward Clark, of Ann Arbor, when the presidents of the various county societies were invited to take seats on the platform, as well as all former presidents of the State Society. Among these were Rev. Mr. Pierce, of Washtenaw; ex-Gov. Felch, of Ann Arbor; Jonathan Shearer, of Plymouth, then the President of the State Society; Mr. Dewey, President of the Lenawee County Society; Hon. Levi Bishop, of Detroit, President of the Wayne County Pioneer Society, and others. The Secretary pro tem., J. C. Holmes, of Detroit, was also seated on the platform.

The exercises were opened by music, furnished by the M. E. choir of Ann Arbor, under the leadership of Prof. Alvin Wilsie.—“Auld Lang Syne.”

Prayer was then offered by the oldest pioneer clergyman present, Rev. J. D. Pierce, of Ypsilanti.

Another piece of music, an anthem, followed.

The address of welcome to the president and members of the State Pioneer Society and other pioneers present was delivered by ex-Gov. Felch, of Ann Arbor. He said words were sometimes spoken which were merely words of the mouth, and others which indicated the feelings of the heart. Of the latter kind were those he addressed to the pioneers assembled in behalf of the county society. All branches of industry have their pioneers; all countries can speak of their first settlers and show their pride in them. The great reward of a pioneer in a new country will be in knowing that his descendants will look upon a country which his industry has redeemed from a wilderness. There is much pleasure in thoughts like these. He could remember the scenes of 40 years, and as he saw the changes that had been wrought, how could he help feeling grateful that he had been in the midst of them? He extended a hearty welcome to those in attendance.

A brief address was then delivered by the president of the State Society, Jonathan Shearer, of Plymouth. He said that he had lived in this State for 40 years, and could feel proud that he had the privilege of representing the pioneers of the State. He thought the work of the pioneers was deserving of the highest praise; for it had been they who had made the country what it is. He had taken much pains in collecting the history of the pioneers of the State, and he had found that it was something to excite the admiration of all.

Prof. J. C. Holmes, of Detroit, Chairman of the Committee of Historians, read the report of the progress of the State Society. He stated that application had been made for suitable rooms in the new capitol, adjoining or near the library, where the historical collection may be displayed and be safe from destruction by fire. On the 28th of February, 1876, the Committee of Historians met at Lansing and issued a circular to the pioneers of Michigan, asking for information in regard to the history of the towns and counties of our State.

The report stated that several of the counties had already responded liberally to this circular.

The committee proposed the following plan for a report:

First, State the time of the organization of the State Pioneer Society. Its proceedings at its several meetings, including papers that have been read. A list of articles that have been donated to the museum, with names of donors, names of officers and members.

Second, Give an alphabetical list of the counties, stating the date at which the county was laid off and by whom; the number of townships in the county, with their names; the name of the county, and as much of its early history as possible.

An example was presented in the history of Jackson county. It consisted in giving first the act of incorporation, the locating of the county-seat, the naming of the townships, and minor facts.

After the report of the committee another piece of music, "To Thee, O Country," was given by the choir, when Rev. J. D. Pierce, of Ypsilanti, the first Superintendent of Public Instruction in Michigan, was called for. He said he had lived in the State for the past 45 years, and that he had consequently lived through the struggle of the schools to become free, and had taken an active part in the work. He related some interesting experiences of his early life.

Hon. Levi Bishop, of Detroit, President of the Wayne County Pioneer Society, was introduced, and spoke at some length. He traced the history of the University, and referred to the minor colleges throughout the State. He did not favor the attempt to remove Albion College to Detroit, thinking it ought not to pass Ann Arbor. He would have the colleges at Albion, Kalamazoo, Adrian, Olivet, etc., brought to Ann Arbor and help build up a great University. He would have the present University do only what it now calls post-graduate work. He said he hoped yet to take the stump on this question. He also recalled some of the incidents of his early life.

After the singing of the "Star Spangled Banner," an adjournment was made to give opportunity to sign the constitution and the payment of dues, after which the assembly withdrew to the basement of the Opera House for a dinner, which had been furnished by the pioneers of Washtenaw county.

After dinner those who desired were given time to visit the University and public schools of the city of Ann Arbor.

The society re-assembled at 3 o'clock, when a short time was consumed in five-minute speeches by different members, and in reading of letters from those unable to attend. A letter was read from Mrs. H. A. Tenney, of Lansing, Secretary of the Society, whose duties at the State Library prevented her attendance. She closed with the sentiment:—"The University of Michigan, one of the first institutions of America to open its doors for the education of the daughters and grand-daughters of the pioneers of the land."

A letter was also read from H. G. Wells, of Kalamazoo, who was unable to be present on account of his official duties. He said:—"It is proper that the State Pioneer Society shall hold this meeting at Ann Arbor, for we, its members, take honor to ourselves by being present in a body in Washtenaw county, which has become famous all over the world by having within its limits the University and the Normal School. The fame of both these institutions is to be credited to the regents, the presidents, and the professors, and the girls and boys who have had their student life therein, all of whom seem to have resolved never to disgrace their alma mater."

Prof. Ten Brook, of the University, was introduced and made a few remarks.

A letter was read from Witter J. Baxter, of Jonesville, who called the attention of the society to the fact that "the State Agricultural Society are to have a centennial department at the State Fair at Jackson, to be held Sept. 19, 20, 21 and 22, at which we hope to receive an exhibition of relics and curiosities of all kinds, and if the pioneers of the State will take the matter earnestly in hand they will enable us to make a very interesting and instructive display."

A committee of three was appointed, on motion of Levi Bishop, to take the matter into consideration, consisting of Messrs. J. Webster Childs, of Washtenaw, Michael Shoemaker, of Jackson and J. C. Holmes, of Wayne.

Interesting speeches followed by Messrs. McDougall, of Bridgewater, and Judge Miller, of Bay City. The latter related some of his early misfortunes in the Saginaw valley, and an instance of good fortune at the hands of an Indian when about to perish from exposure. He was engaged 40 years ago in running a saw-mill on the Saginaw river, and was one of two men who operated the saw themselves, before steam was introduced and water utilized; and Mr. Holmes humorously suggested that it was proposed to preserve him at the State museum as a relic of that saw-mill.

Rev. Mr. Lamb, of Ypsilanti, followed, so old and feeble that he could hardly make himself heard.

Mr. John Geddes, of Washtenaw county, had been in the county for 54 years, and has lived on the same farm, a few miles east of Ann Arbor, during all this period. Mr. J. W. Brooks, a colored gentleman 78 years of age, of Ann Arbor, related some of the experiences of his life.

Judge Miller, of Bay City, being called upon for an explanation of his duty as a part of a saw-mill, stated that he was technically called the pitman, and his work was to stand beneath the log while a man was above, and the two together operated the saw. He said they cut in the year 1834, in the only mill on the Saginaw river, enough lumber to build a floor for a small shanty. Now they turn out sufficient lumber annually in the various mills on the Saginaw river to build a sidewalk around the globe three feet wide and an inch and a half thick, and have left 6,000,000 feet.

A glorious tribute was paid to the memory of Gen. Lewis Cass by Lorenzo Davis, of Washtenaw county, and Jonathan Shearer, of Wayne. The latter designated him as the father of the pioneers of the Northwest. Mr. Davis also related some of his personal experiences with the first Governor of Michigan, Stevens Thompson Mason.

After voting thanks to the Washtenaw county pioneers for the attention shown the State society, an adjournment took place to the next regular meeting.

CHAPTER XVIII.

FOURTH OF JULY.

FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY OF THE SETTLEMENT OF WASHTENAW COUNTY.

The semi-centennial celebration of the settlement of Washtenaw county was observed in Ypsilanti, on Saturday, July 4, 1874. The exercises of the Fourth of July, 1874, and July 4, 1824, half a century ago, in Ypsilanti, were in marked contrast. On that day the entire population of Washtenaw county, consisting of only 28 persons, met and celebrated the day. On Saturday, July, 4, 1874, the number of people in Ypsilanti was estimated as high as 30,000. The train on the railroads were all loaded to their utmost capacity. The mail train on the Michigan Central road had to be increased by the addition of an extra car at Detroit, and after leaving the Junction hundreds of people were left at every station until reaching Ypsilanti, who were unable to get on board. A monster train of 19 cars came in from Detroit as an extra, bringing the Detroit Cadets, the National Guards and 2,000 or more people from along the line of the road. A special train came in on the Detroit, Hillsdale & Indiana road, bringing a train of 21 cars, all loaded to their fullest capacity. On the arrival of the extra train from Detroit at Ypsilanti, a telegram was received from Ann Arbor announcing that the regular train could not bring the people. The Detroit train's engine with eight coaches was then sent down to Ann Arbor, and returned with all the coaches loaded. Besides the people who arrived by railroad, thousands of farmers came in from the country in wagons and processions. The procession formed on Cross street, about half-past 10 o'clock, under the direction of the Chief Marshal, F. P. Borgardus, in the following order:

FIRST DIVISION.

Ypsilanti Light Guard.

Marshal and aid, Capt. C. Newell, Lieut. U. F. Halleck, U. S. A.; Martial Band; Detroit Cadets, Pelouze Corps; Major J. S. Rogers commanding. Company B, Michigan State Troops, Ann Arbor; S. B. Revenaugh commanding. Governor and Staff, President, Chaplain, and Orators of the Day, and Members of the Press, in carriages.

SECOND DIVISION.

Fire Department, with apparatus; E. Batweli, foreman. Band, German Turner and Arbeiter Societies; Raphael Kopp, Marshal. Washtenaw County Pioneers; N. Follett, H. C. Camp, Marshals. Visitors and citizens in carriages; C. L. Yost, Marshal.

The procession marched through the principal streets and to the fair ground, where the exercises of the day were held. The procession was one of the finest features of the occasion. It was preceded by a police force of the Ypsilanti Light Guard, who kept the streets along the line of march well cleared. Crossett's Constantine band led the procession. The Detroit National Guard presented a fine appearance. They were about 90 strong, with 50 of them in new dress uniforms, and the remainder in old State uniform. The Detroit cadets turned out about 175 strong, led by Major Rogers, and were the observed of all observers. Company B, of Michigan State troops, Ann Arbor, were out with 60 rifles, and the Ypsilanti Light Guard in about the same numbers. The bulk of the procession was composed of carriages and wagons, and especially of the latter, carrying farmers from the adjoining township with their wives and families. The pioneers occupied the place in the procession assigned them. They numbered some 50 persons, consisting entirely of old men from 60 to 85 years of age. It would seem that they, of all others, should have been furnished with carriages, but they had been assigned a place on foot, and marched sturdily along in the dust, and uncovered under the hot rays of the sun, keeping step to the music over the entire line of march.

The streets and many of the dwelling houses along the line of march were handsomely decorated with flags, flowers, and evergreens. Across Cross street, just west of the Michigan Central railroad track, a grand arch was stretched, composed of flowers and evergreens, the top surmounted by the American flag. Suspended from the top of the arch was a female figure representing the Goddess of Liberty, draped with the Stars and Stripes, and wearing the cap of liberty. Across the lower segment of the arch was stretched a banner with the inscription "1824—1874. Welcome." Across Congress street was stretched a large banner, bearing the motto "Yipsylanty, Washtenak; 1824—1874. Hard to spell but can't be beat." Again at the corner of Congress and Summit streets was displayed a large banner, bearing the motto "The day we celebrate. 1824—1874." These are a few of the many decorations which made Ypsilanti look very beautiful on that day.

On reaching the fair-grounds, the procession, and thousands who were not in the regular procession, proceeded to where the speaker's stand had been erected, in a pleasant little grove in the northwest corner of the grounds, which was all too small to shelter the immense throng from the hot sun. A large stand had been erected on the southern edge of the grove, for the accommodation of the officers of the day, the speakers, and invited guests.

The platform was occupied by the president of the day, S. M. Cutcheon, and the following vice-presidents composed of the supervisors of the several townships in the county, and mayors, and presidents of the cities and villages:

Hiram J. Beakes, Mayor of Ann Arbor; Watson Snyder, Mayor of Ypsilanti; Myron H. Webb, President of Saline village; C.

Wallbridge, President of Manchester village; John Costello, President of Dexter village; M. J. Noyes, President of Chelsea village; Selden W. Shurtleff, Ann Arbor; Aaron Childs, Augusta; James M. Kress, Bridgewater; Patrick Fleming, Dexter; Elias Haire, Freedom; B. C. Whitaker, Lima; E. T. Harper, Lodi; Thomas Young, Lyndon; S. W. Holmes, Scio; Emerson Annabil, Sharon; Pomeroy VanRiper, Webster; Horatio Burch, Manchester; George Renwick, Northfield; David Wiltsie, Pittsfield; John Crandal, Salem; F. P. Galpin, Superior; M. J. Noyes, Sylvan; Jesse Warner, York; W. Irving Yeckley, Ypsilanti.

There were also present as guests: Gov. Bagley and his Staff. Adj.-Gen. Robertson, Gen. L. S. Trowbridge, Gen. W. A. Throop. Gen. John Pulford, Maj. George H. Hopkins, and Col. William Phelps, all of Detroit; Alpha Washtenaw Bryant, the first white child born in Washtenaw county.

The exercises were opened with music by the Constantine cornet band. Prayer was then offered by Rev. John D. Pierce, well known all over the State as the "father of the University." Mr. Pierce was one of the oldest divines in the State, and also a Washtenaw pioneer. After prayer, a song entitled "Hand in Hand" was sung by a choir from Ypsilanti, under the leadership of Prof. F. H. Pease.

The historical address was then delivered by Hon. L. D. Norris, of Grand Rapids, formerly of Ypsilanti, and one of its earliest settlers.

Mr. Norris in reading mentioned the name of Alpha Washtenaw Bryan, the first white child born in the county; and loud calls being made for Mr. Bryan, he stepped to the front of the stage, and was greeted with three hearty cheers. He was about 50 years of age and looked much the same as other men born at about the same time in other parts of the county without the distinction of being the "first white child." His mother also being called for, stepped forward and was received by three rousing cheers. She was eighty years old but remarkably lively for a lady of her age.

Mr. Norris was obliged, on account of the wind, to omit the larger portion of his address, reading only those portions bearing directly on the pioneer history of the county. At the close of his address, the choir, assisted by the audience, sang with fine effect the "Star Spangled Banner."

Hon. Schuyler Colfax delivered the oration, after which the choir and audience joined in singing "America" and "Auld Lang Syne."

Then came the dinner. The speakers, officers and guests, were provided with a fine dinner at one of the halls on the ground. The Washtenaw Pioneer Society had a real old-fashioned picnic dinner for themselves under the shade of the trees. The remainder of the people repaired to the hotels in the city, and the many booths on the ground. After dinner there was an hour of rest, and visiting between the old residents of the county, very many of whom were in attendance. During this time Crossett's band, from Constantine, played some good selections of music, in a very creditable manner, and were heartily cheered by the many thousands who had been listening.

Promptly at 4.00, p. m., the military companies, in the following order: National Guards, Pelouze Cadets, Company B, Michigan State troops, and Ypsilanti Light Guards, moved into the large ground enclosed by the race-course, where, after going through the various evolutions of the tactics in a commendable manner, they were reviewed by Governor Bagley, assisted by his staff and the marshals.

At 6.00, p. m., the Ypsilanti Fire Department was reviewed. The company, with new uniform, and the steamer, Clark Cornwell, appropriately trimmed, presented a very attractive appearance. The afternoon and evening trains brought large reinforcements from all directions, to witness the display of fireworks. A large balloon, which ascended, sent down variously colored lights, until it all disappeared, which was the sign for hostilities to commence. The fireworks were sent off by experts from Detroit, thereby insuring greater safety. In addition to the proverbial rockets and candles, several pieces were fired which had been manufactured expressly for the occasion. Prominent among them was "Washtenaw, 1824—1874," and "Welcome to Ypsilanti." "George Washington," on horseback, was also exhibited, and several Chinese flower pots. The exercises closed with a beautiful "Good Night," and the audience slowly dispersed for their respective homes. The celebration was in every sense a success. The arrangements of the various committees and officers were perfect and were carried out with promptness exactly according to the programme. Not an accident occurred during the day to mar the festivities, and all went home in the best of humor.

HISTORICAL ADDRESS BY THE HON. L. D. NORRIS.

"Twenty-seven years ago to-day, then fresh from college, upon the occasion of the dedication of Independence island, within the limits of this quiet city and in the bosom of the Huron, I made a maiden bow to an audience of the good people of the eastern side of Old Washtenaw—nursing mother of good farmers. The necessities of trade and manufacture have since then dammed the rapid flow over its pebbly bed of your favorite river, and shorn this island gem of much of its natural beauty.

"Twenty-seven years at work in the din and dust of the world's great work-shop, in the struggle and strife of an exacting profession (no portion of the last 15 years of which has been devoted to literary study or labor), forcibly reminded me, as, at the last moment of the last hour, I sat down to redeem by thought and word, on paper, my pledge to help the pioneers of Washtenaw fight their battles over, of the magnitude of the task I had rashly undertaken;

how rusty was the old literary armor so long hung up; how the necessities of my profession had diverted to other channels the flow of apt word and thought, wherewith to deftly paint the old fireside scenes, the 'moving accidents by flood and field' that attended the early struggle with the wilderness of untamed nature, which 50 years since shadowed the broad acres, where now are fruitful farms, happy homes, thriving villages and wealthy and luxurious cities. And yet, I must to my task.

"The territory known as the Peninsula of Michigan has had a varied and romantic history. It was known to the French Jesuits, and occupied by their chapels and missionary stations as early as 1648. It was the home and hunting ground of the Huron. In 1667 French troops from Louis XIV. appeared upon the scene to protect the fur trade. That 'romance of the forest' and bane of emigration and progress was being jeopardized in that bloodiest of all Indian conflicts, between the Hurons and the warlike tribes of the Six Nations, who, as Charlevoix says, never appeared in Canada, 'but they set the country on fire,' and who in 1670 had defeated and well-nigh exterminated their hereditary foes. * * * *

THE FIRST MAP OF MICHIGAN.

"The first general map of the surveyed part of this Territory of which I have any knowledge, was published in 1825 by Orange Risdon, then and now a pioneer of Washtenaw, and to-day in his 93d year, hale and hearty and present with you. Upon this map, in addition to the counties before named, six others are given, though their organizations as counties were all subsequent to the imprint of the map. They were Washtenaw and Lenawee, both organized Nov. 20, 1825; Saginaw, Jan. 28, 1835; Shiawassee, March 18, 1837; Sanilac as late as 1839, yet attached, and Lapeer, Jan. 20, 1835.

"While the pioneers of 50 years ago may have thought and said,

'No pent up Utica contracts our powers,
For the whole boundless continent is ours,' they were nevertheless satisfied to occupy and possess a very small corner of it; and the baker's dozen of Indian reservations dotted over its surface show that even in that small corner they were content to divide with 'Lo,' the poor Indian.

"Upon this map the average village is indicated by four black dots or fly specks, and Washtenaw is noted for four such villages; for, though Dixborough has a name as large and as black as the rest, yet it appears not to have reached the dignity of one speck. The relative size of the then four settlements is given in the order following: Ann Arbor, 10 specks; Woodruff's Grove, 8; Ypsilanti, 3, and Dexter, 2; a fair average for Washtenaw, as Detroit couldn't boast of more than 20. Sutton (Benj.), the pioneer, covers sections 27 and 28 of Northfield.

IRON ORE AND SALT SPRINGS.

"Maps, like other works of fallen humanity, are not always truthful, for, upon this you will observe that sections 7 of Pittsfield and 12 of Lodi are all 'iron ore.' It may have been so then, but sure I am that the Hicks and Van Giessons, the Depuys, Henions, Sheldons, Wilseys and others who have since occupied and possessed that land have kept curiously still concerning this rare deposit.

"Then, too, sections 2 and 11 of Saline are 'salt springs,' but well you remember that nearly all of us of this enlightened age had 'some of that salt-boring stock!' We have it yet, 'though lost to sight to memory dear,' gone to rest in the lengthy hole that ran down (so science has told us) through the edge of the saucer-like salt basin of Michigan. We were also told by the same learned savant that more money and a longer hole would somewhere 'in the bowels of the harmless earth' reach the great Onondaga salt saucer near the middle, where the brine was all the while; that here it only slopped over the edge of the Michigan saucer. I think the company, in the expressive slang of the day, wisely concluded to 'let it slop,' as it had done for many ages, a noted salt lick of the red deer and the red Indians. * * * * *

THE MEETING FIFTY YEARS AGO.

"I purpose, fellow pioneers, to keep myself and you wholly in the past; we came here for that—to exchange greetings and compare notes and recollections of the trials, pleasures and conquests of that early life; and while I can hope to touch only a few of the manifold matters of interest to you in that past, my ambition will be more than gratified if I can set you thinking and talking, each with the other, of what you personally knew and saw of the events of that early day.

"Fifty years ago to-day all the then inhabitants of Washtenaw, variously given at from 14 to 29, assembled, most of them, around the venerable table, now near its 100th year, which stands on this platform, and is yet an heirloom in the family of the gallant Maj. Ben. Woodruff. It was at the point in this county (Woodruff's Grove) where, on the 4th day of June of the year previous, the first white woman (Mrs. Woodruff) had come with her husband, to make a pioneer's home in the far West. Judge Robert Fleming presided. The field-piece was a bored out, iron-bound oak log, and a distinguished guest was the Indian chief, Blue Jacket.

"It was doubtless a day of jollity, with song, speech and dance. It was nearer to the great day of '76, and patriotic fever raged higher then than now. I know not that they had any higher sense of the merit of the great achievement than we of this day, but the press had not then scattered its sheets 'like the autumnal leaves which strew the vales of Vallambrosa,' and the people listened more patiently to speeches and talk, and were more happy and frequent in coming together in a social and festive way for an interchange of opinions and the hearing of the news of the day, a commodity of such common use, in these later days, that we devour the new events of the world in the half-hour given to our morning coffee, and forget them in less time, as we hurry out and on, after the almighty dollar.

WHISKY AND POLITICS.

"Doubtless, whisky had something to do with that day's doings. In those days people didn't stop to learn whether it was a food or a poison; whether it assimilated with the blood and became part of it, or whether it was only a stimulant and was excreted; nor whether it was to be prohibited or licensed. It was with them, they all thought, a necessity, or at least a familiar creature which cured rattlesnake bites, and alleviated 'fever and ague;' and in families where no cow was kept, a barrel a week was not much of an allowance, as all were hospitable and he was the 'churl' who, in those days, did not 'put the bottle to his neighbor's lips.'

"No doubt some politics were talked and pretty much, I take it, in the spirit and temper of these later and, as we fondly think, wiser days of ours. For I find a few years later upon the occasion of the appointment of a successor to Judge William Woodbridge, that the good Judge whom we of the present age, without distinction of party, believe to be learned, incorruptible and faithful in the discharge of his public duties, was, after all, no better than the rest of us; for he used the revenue cutter to bring cedar posts from the islands of Lake Erie to fence his country seat below Detroit. His law student was rated as an 'able-bodied seaman'—that's higher than most of them would rate in these days—in the revenue service and drew pay as such, and that most of them would do now-a-days, if given the chance. At least that is what 'Consistency' (whoever he may have been) says in the Democratic Free Press and Michigan Intelligencer of March 15, 1832; and he takes five of its 24 dingy columns to say that and more of like consistency.

"I have imagined that whisky and the politics of the 'era of good feeling,' when all were Republicans and all were Federalists, the close of Monroe's quiet and uneventful administration, had something to do with this first Fourth of July's festivities.

"It would seem that politics waxed hotter and whisky grew stronger. Gen. Jackson's star was slowly rising to its ascendant over the single term of the coalition, 'Bliffl and Black George, the Puritan and the Blackleg,' that being the playful way those days had of speaking of the younger Adams, for one-term President, and Henry Clay, his Secretary of State, one of his nine competitors, all of whom, by the way, were Republicans of that day.

AN EARLY TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.

"Whisky certainly grew more potential, and in 1829 our good old county set out upon a crusade, not of prayers and prohibitory laws, but of 'moral suasion,' temperance societies, townships and county pledges, to abstain from the use of all ardent spirits, as a beverage, the free use of wine, beer and cider being allowed to members. It was an earnest hand-to-hand conflict of men, in which nearly all good citizens participated, in which most of those that sold, sold no more, a few not hesitating to stave in the heads of barrels, watering the earth with a much purer and better article than, in these days of tariff and excise, money can buy.

"I have had access to much family correspondence and records relating thereto, one letter of which, under the date of January, 1832, merits rehearsal. The writer has no relatives or friends left in this region, but I suppress the name, as not needed 'to point the moral or adorn the tale.'

"It would seem that the constitutions of those earlier societies did not, at first, prohibit the sale, but only the free use of 'strong waters,' and this was under the control of the doctors, not always temperance doctors. With this introduction the letter speaks for itself.

To the Secretary of the Ypsilanti Temperance Society:

SIR: My feelings have been touched in a tender point. After reflecting that I was one of the first to lend my influence in the support of the cause of temperance, both by precept and example, then to be dealt with in the way I was that evening, is unmanly and ungenerous, and more than human nature or human reason ought to bear. If I had violated the constitution there would have been just grounds for the objection.

There is no article prohibiting any member from selling distilled spirits. Of course, where there is no law there is no sin. The very man who has purchased bottle after bottle of liquor of me this season is the first one to rise up and condemn me for selling it to him, and even the man whose zeal destroys his better judgment must rise up and say that he was about to make the same objection on account of its being an injury to the cause of temperance. I would ask that man, which would be the most injurious to the cause: to sell liquor, or the amendment of the constitution, as he proposed. I say that the amendment would have done the most harm, for there would have been at least one-half of the members withdrawn from the society.

The amendment proposed was, "That no member shall make use of any distilled spirits as a medicine, unless by the advice of a temperance physician." Any man of common sense can see that such an amendment is leading to aristocracy.

I have no doubt that the abuse I received that evening was in consequence of my opposing that amendment, and was done for retaliation; otherwise, why all this abuse? I have feelings, like other men, and too much so to be made sport of in such a way as that. And unless there is some retraction on the part of some individuals present that evening there will be a breach in the society which will not be soon healed. Whoever lives to see a few years more will see the members of that society bound under sacerdotal government. As for myself I was brought up in a land of liberty, where I could speak and think without being proscribed. I always mean to be free and use my liberty in all cases, and will be the first one that withdraws from a society which wishes to bind me under such tyrannical laws. Therefore, under these considerations, Mr. Secretary, I shall consider myself no longer a member of the Ypsilanti Temperance Society. You will please to strike my name from the list after reading this before the society at the next meeting.

THE SITUATION IN 1824.

"Pausing here at this eventful celebration, let us contemplate for a moment a shade more in detail, the situation of the county and Territory. Politically, the administration of Monroe was drawing to a close. It had been a quiet one, in which the country had been rebuilding itself after the war of 1812. The debt of the United States, at the highest point it had ever reached, over $127,000,000, in the closing year (1816) of Madison's term, was at the closing year of Monroe's term (1825) but little over $83,000,000. It was thereafter to steadily decrease to the almost vanishing point of $37,513, with an income of almost $20,000,000 in excess of expenditure in 1836, the closing year of Gen. Jackson's term of office, and would to God the good people of these States could again find his equal! The census of 1830 gave the population of 27 States and Territories, and the District of Columbia, at upward of 12,000,000. Michigan, 31,639, increased in 1840 to 212,267, or over 250 per cent. At the session of Congress which met in December of 1823, King (Rufus and Wm. R.), Macon, Hayne and Jackson, in the Senate, and in the House, Clay and Webster (now representing Massachusetts), Forsyth, Rives and Livingston were the leading spirits.

"The chief measures of interest were the Monroe doctrine, who should be the next President and the tariff. On this latter we find, as representing the navigation interest of New England, Webster, in full concord with the planting interest of the South and opposing, while the agricultural and manufacturing interest of the East and West was led by the gallant 'Harry of the West,' favoring. For 10 weeks the battle raged, and not until April 16, 1824, did the tariff revision pass the House by the meager majority of five, and the Senate by four, a month later. Bills to abolish imprisonment for debt and for a bankrupt act both failed.

"Internal improvement secured but $30,000 for surveys, plans and estimates of such roads and canals as the President might deem of national importance. The leading topics of the year were the gallant struggle Greece was making against the Turks and the South American revolutions. It was a busy session; none more so had been held before it. Two hundred and twelve measures had passed to completion. This summer was also rendered memorable by a visit of the illustrious Lafayette, who landed in New York on the 15th of August, 1824. As the older among you will readily recall, his tour through the country as the 'Hero of two worlds,' and 'the Nation's guest,' was a perpetual ovation. In the fall of 1825 he received a township of land in Florida and $200,000 in money, and was sped on his homeward way by the Nation's new frigate named in his honor, the Brandywine.

"Perhaps the event of this period which had the largest influence upon the future prospects of 'the Far West,' which in those days meant this Territory, but in the 50 years since numbered with the dead past has, like the vanishing point in perspective, passed westward still with the 'Star of Empire' until it has disappeared down the western slopes of the Rocky Mountains, was the completion of 'Clinton's Big Ditch.' This great work foreshadowed by Gen.

Washington in a letter written to Gen. Harrison Oct. 10, 1774, suggested by Gouverneur Morris in 1777, who in 1811, 34 years later, was at the head of the commissioners created by New York to put the work in motion, was due, in its perfection and completeness, to the energy, wisdom and perseverance of DeWitt Clinton. The ground was broken July 4, 1817, and on Oct. 4, 1825, the first boat passed over the 360 miles from Lake Erie, and arrived at New York. A wonderful stimulus was now given to the growth and prosperity of all the lake region, and the Territory of Michigan, with its 1,620 miles of lake coast, felt the impulse. If I add to these few of the current events, that about these days (September, 1826) William Morgan disappeared in a close carriage moving from Ontario county jail toward the Niagara frontier, you will, I think, have enough suggestive history to enable you to recall many of the minuter and more personal incidents of those bygone days.

“Certain it is that the bitter and excited state of feeling that grew up with the rise of the Anti-Masonic party in Western New York operated as largely as any one cause to fill up the Territory, and particularly Washtenaw, with men of substance and power. There are but few among the early pioneers but can make a roll of names of those they know to have come West because Morgan, like the soul of John Brown, would ‘keep marching on,’ and, like the ghost of Banquo, would not ‘down.’

SETTLEMENT OF THE COUNTRY.

“In the Territory at and near the era of which I have been speaking, but little had been done toward the real settlement of the country. There were two land districts, that of Detroit, established as early as 1804 (but none of the public domain in the district had been sold prior to 1818), and that of Monroe, created in 1823, which was divided from the Detroit district west from the Detroit river, on the north line of the south tier of townships of Washtenaw. In 1824 but 61,919 acres had been sold in the Detroit district, over 50,000 of which were in the years '22 and '23 just preceding. The 12th year thereafter the sales for the year were 1,475,725 acres, with a total up to that year of over 4,000,000 acres; while in the meantime three other land districts, Kalamazoo (1831), Saginaw and Grand River (1836), had been established.

“The recognized hamlets or villages along the lake and river shores were, Port Lawrence or the Monroe side of the Maumee, a bay settlement, as it was called, just north of the Ottawa Reservation of 10,240 acres at the mouth of the Maumee; Monroe; Frenchtown, opposite; Brownstown in Wayne county, abreast of the south end of Grosse Isle; Truax's, a few miles above; the city of Detroit, and Mt. Clemens, all reached by a United States road running along or near the shore line, from the north boundary line of Ohio. On the St. Clair was Palmer, opposite Fort St. Clair, at the mouth of Pine river, connected by a trail road along St. Clair river to Fort Gratiot and the Lighthouse. Tecumseh, Pontiac, and lastly Saginaw were well-known places.

ROADS AND TRAILS.

"The principal roads about that time projected were the Detroit and Chicago, with a fork at Ypsilanti to Ann Arbor and Dexter, and another fork west of Ypsilanti, southwesterly to Tecumseh. Another road led northeasterly from Detroit to Pontiac and the Saginaws, while the Pottawatomie trail up and down the Huron, used by the Indians on their way from the far West to their payments at Malden, was a well-recognized means of entrance and exit. Most of you pioneers remember it well, and how the Indian-file mode of progress had worn it in places to the depth of two feet. It was a romantic pathway over the gravelly hills and through the fat valleys of the Huron, then skirted with Indian corn-fields, burying grounds and camping stations, ever hugging the shore-line in its serpentine windings to the blue waters of Erie. I have said that the most of these roads were projected (still more than I have named are given on the Risdon map), but the most noted of them all, the Chicago and Detroit, was first cut through toward Ypsilanti, in advance of the first ox team by pioneer John Bryan, reaching the Huron at Woodruff's Grove, on the night of the 23d of October, 1823.

ALPHA WASHTENAW.

"Four months after (Feb. 27, 1824), Mrs. Bryan gave birth to the first white child born in the limits of old Washtenaw. To memorize the event, and as all pioneers in those days were well up in their Greek, he was, by Allen and Ramsey, of Ann Arbor, christened Alpha Washtenaw. John Bryan died not many years since at Constantine, but the mother (now residing there) and the infant Alpha (aged 50), a teacher from Tennessee, are to-day here present, recalling the memories of early days and trying to find on the north end of the Jacob Emerick farm the home of 50 years ago.

"As late as 1831 this Chicago road was worked no farther west than Chicago. * * * * *

FROM 1830 TO 1840.

"Passing now to the period of 1830, we find the country with a population of 4,032. Washtenaw is still on the verge of the wilderness, steamboats in their infancy, but 24 years from the experiment of Robert Fulton, railroads none, telegraphs yet in the forked lightning and not bottled.

"But coming forward to the end of the next decade, what an eventful 10 years to the Territory passing into a State! Its population is now 212,267—seven times that of 1830.

L. C. Allen

"The cholera of '32 and '34, and the famous quarantine at Colby's Corners, the Black Hawk war, the Toledo boundary fracas, the Patriot war, the wild-cat speculations, the admission of the State into the Union—each and all the theme for a lengthy treatise. No people ever made history faster. It fairly makes the head whirl to recall the many events that crowd this decade—the population of the county in '40 almost equal to that of the State in '30, 231 miles of canal, 321 of river and 557 miles of railroad improvements entered upon by a State within two years of its birth! The estimated cost of all this is nearly $8,000,000, and nearly $500,000 actually expended. So much for the State.

EARLY RAILROADING.

"In the meantime private enterprise was not behind-hand. Twenty-four chartered railroads undertook to create 1,011 miles of railroad. Washtenaw had, in 1836, the 'Monroe & Ypsilanti,' with a capital stock of $400,000. It was to run from Ypsilanti, via Rawson's Mills, to some point on the River Raisin and Lake Erie railroad, near Monroe, to commence in two years, finish 12 miles in four years and get through in eight. There is no survey, no stock and no road yet. The 'Monroe & Ann Arbor' the last description will answer if we add—the line, being seven miles longer, the stock was $100,000 less.

"The 'Ypsilanti & Tecumseh,' incorporated in 1838, capital $200,000, borrowed $100,000 of the State, and spent a portion. It had an engineer and contractors, and moved some dirt near the city, traces of which are yet visible just south of the city limits, east of the Monroe road. Bronson Murray, its engineer, now a prominent citizen of New-York city, was here a day or two since inspecting his work, and at this date (July 2) is expected to assist you to celebrate.

"But of all these railroads, which promised so much under the stimulus of 'wild-cat' bank paper, none performed but the old 'Detroit & St. Joseph' and its successor, the now well-known 'Central,' chartered as a private company in 1831, with a nominal capital of $1,500,000. The company had in good faith, and under many adverse fates, expended nearly $117,000, when it was sold to the State (1837). At a cost of about $400,000, including rolling stock, it was (Feb. 5, 1838) completed to Ypsilanti. Its receipts for the first four months and 11 days of its existence were $23,963.-56. They nearly doubled that in the next two months, transporting nearly 10,000 passengers, or an average of 200 for each working day. It reached Ann Arbor in October, 1839.

"That was the callow day of railroading and engineering. The perfect line was a reverse curve. Engineering followed the stream in all its sinuosities (witness this serpentine the Huron from Ypsilanti to Dexter, where now are tangent lines and 16 bridges) from the mouth to the source, then crossed the divide to the nearest stream on the route, and ran down the winding margin of that to or near the objective point.

"This road was built on a continuous wooden rail or stringer of sawed timber. This rail was fitted into sawed ties, held to the tie in a trapezoidal groove by wooden wedges. On the top of this continuous stringer was spiked the old iron strap rail when they had it, and when they didn't, a 1½x3-inch oak ribbon nailed to the tie did duty in its place. The passenger car of that day resembled an omnibus placed at right angles to the track, moving sidewise on four wheels.

"The conductor walked a platform in front and along the end of the omnibus train, and collected his fares hanging by the arms in the window. The usual boy's ambition to be a stage driver gave way in these days to his wish to be a conductor. 'Snake heads,' or the old strap rail worn and loosened from the stringers, occasionally varied the monotony by curling up their ugly points through the floor of the car. The equipment of the road during the first few months after it reached Ypsilanti was four locomotives, five passenger and 10 freight cars, running upon four wheels like any well-regulated wagon in an exceedingly jerky and independent way.

TURNPIKE TRAVEL.

"But for all that it was a much pleasanter way of locomotion than the old Detroit and Chicago dirt road, which, in the first few weeks of its turnpike existence (in 1829) was passable in about four hours in the old-fashioned two-wheeled gig, hung on thorough-braces, and which a few months later was not passable by the rushing tide of immigration for an empty wagon and a strong team of horses in much less than as many days. Its dreary route led through seas of mud and over miles of 'corduroy,' with every mile an 'inn,' of which TenEyck's, at Dearborn, Ruff's, near Wayne, and Sheldon's were well known and favorite ends of the several days' journeys, of about 10 miles each. In 1828 this route was 'no thoroughfare,' and the usual way of ingress to old Washtenaw was by the 'Old Road,' as it was called, by Plymouth, Dixborough and Ann Arbor. Even that was almost bottomless. In that year the same favorite gig and Anson Brown's one-horse wagon were three days bringing the reader, a toddling infant, and his respected parents, in sight of their new home in the valley of the Huron. A first glimpse of its few log cabins and its solitary frame building, unfinished and even uncovered (afterward Perry's, more recently Bucklin's Tavern) from the brow of the hill, where now is 'God's quiet acre'—Highland Cemetery, I learn from one who had borne her own and the reader's share of the toil of that weary pilgrimage—was not assuring. It was greeted by that luxury of woman's woe—a good cry.

WOMAN'S WORK.

“Forty-six years last June, with its lights and shadows, its failures and its successes, its joys and its privations, have since passed, and one who was the staff and stay of that little family has gone to his rest on the hill that gave to those near and dear to him a first outlook upon that pioneer life that was to come, and was to be and was made to develop those forces of head and heart which in the luxury and ease of an older civilization rarely appear.

“Nor was it always the dark side of the shield which looked out upon the pioneer, for though many, perhaps most, of the earliest settlers were a rough and godless band of hardy adventurers, yet manhood and womanhood were there in all their strength and beauty; and nowhere in the world of created intelligence did God's ‘last, best gift to man’ more clearly assume the character of a help-mate than in the log cabins and amid the rough and trying scenes incident to a home in the wilderness. Ever foremost in the work of civilization and progress, she was to-day physician, to-morrow nurse, and the next day teacher, yet always busy in that wearisome household work that knows no pause ‘from morn till dewy eve,’ from month to month and year to year, as through many privations and much new and strange experience of that ‘necessity which is the mother of invention,’ husband and wife, hand to hand and shoulder to shoulder, worked out in the green arches of the forest the beginnings of the Washtenaw of to-day.

PIONEER TRADING AND PRICES.

“Nor was the progress a slow one. The figures I have given you show how rapid it was. Neighborhood then meant the Territory, and a ride of 20 or 30 miles, over a bottomless road, to an afternoon's tea and visit was an ordinary matter. As early as 1829, 150 miles, from St. Joseph to Ypsilanti, was frequently traveled by pioneers who wanted a few rolls carded or a little tea, shirting and whisky. Merchandising meant in those days having everything to sell which a pioneer wanted, and was brisk and lively. It's an even question, whether the trade was not as good then as it is to-day with some of this city's merchants.

“Take one example: Goods purchased in New York, having made the tour of the Hudson, the Erie canal and the lake, are due and anxiously expected in Detroit. Along the trail up the Huron comes the intelligence that the schooner upon which they are is passing up the river. Seven two and four-horse teams are started through the mud for Detroit to await their arrival, and the merchant goes with them. The vessel is becalmed at the mouth of the river; he boards her in the stream, finds his merchandise in good order, and returns to Detroit to await the coming of the schooner and his venture. After a season they do come, and in 31 days from New York they are on the shelves for sale at the reasonable prices

(in July, 1829) which follow: Shirting, $12\frac{1}{2}$ cents a yard; sheeting, $18\frac{3}{4}$ cents; iron, 9 cents a pound; nails, 11 cents; tea \$1 @ 1.25; coffee, 25 cents; rum, \$1.50 per gallon; brandy, \$2 (to inn-keepers, \$1.87 $\frac{1}{2}$); whisky, 50 cents; by the barrel, $37\frac{1}{2}$ cents. * * *

"Then as now, 'credit exceeded cash,' but there were but few bad debts. I find but few accounts of those days unbalanced. Now and then one is balanced, after the quaint and quiet way of the bookkeeper, by the entry, 'Runaway like a scoundrel.' In those days it was imprisonment for debt, and debt was dreaded. Later, in '39, '40 and '41, the balancing is not so uniform, and the bankrupt act of '40 appears on the ledger's pages much too often for the health of the assets.

SOCIAL LIFE.

"Passing from the trade to the social life of those earlier days let me give you (still drawing from the old letters, which furnish so accurately and truthfully the lights and shadows of pioneer life) a scene near the Raisin, between Adrian and Monroe, in the winter of '32 or '33. A party of two ladies and two gentlemen, after a weary drive through the wilderness, passing on the way but two or three log cabins, are approaching at nightfall the solitary log house of Judge Tiffany. Here let the writer speak for herself:

'Everything looked wild and gloomy without, and I must confess I dreaded to go in with so many of us to stay, and we had heard that two families lived there; but in we went, when lo! instead of seven or eight ragged children we might possibly have seen, we found a large, comfortable fire, the inmates all well dressed, floor carpeted, two large bureaus, a sideboard, a very large looking-glass, a large library in one corner of the room, and a bass viol and bassoon hanging up. I assure you the change from outside to inside view of the premises was sudden and startling. There were about 20 persons present, most of whom came three or four miles, their nearest neighbor being a mile and a half. The Judge's family came in last fall from Palmyra, had a saw-mill in operation and a village laid out (of course) to be called Fairfield—when they get a postoffice. We were affectionately received, hospitably entertained, and found them a highly interesting and intelligent family.

"As I have said that whisky and godlessness were abroad in this land, let me also add that prayer and true religion worked by their side—the wheat with the tares, then, as ever, and no more fervent prayer ever rose to heaven than went from that Christian home from the lips of pioneer minister I. M. Wead, faithful to all life's duties, even unto death.

"How comfortable the 12 or 15 inmates were put to sleep in the many-bedded and raftered chambers, each bed partitioned from its neighbors with snowy sheets and counterpanes, as was the custom of those days! How kindly they were sped on their way in the morning! You, from the picture of the letter, can better imagine than I can describe. Now, as I draw near the conclusion of this too lengthy paper, which I have no time to review or revise, I am painfully sensible of its many omissions. More than a reference is justly due to the rise and growth of

of the State, whose first aged Superintendent has so feelingly invoked the blessings of heaven to rest upon your future life and labors, as it has upon your past. The University and the Normal, which from the bosom of old Washtenaw annually send forth to the State and Nation young men and maidens trained for the duties of life, deserve more than a passing word. But I may not longer weary your patience. They were not here in 1830, and are not yet 60 years old, and I must leave them for the centennial, at which time they will, without doubt, receive a due meed of commendation at the hands of some yet unborn historian of the empire, founded many years before by Ulysses I.

“It is not the great achievements of the Nation or State you are here to-day to commemorate. As old neighbors and friends, now more widely separate each from the other by the rushing speed of the locomotive and the flash of the telegraph than were the pioneers with their miles of wilderness and slow moving oxen, you meet once again with kindly greeting, to renew the friendships and recollections of your youth; to fight your battles o’er; to tell your children’s children how the wilderness of 50 years ago was made to blossom; how the 20 or 30 pioneers of the Fourth of July, 1824, have come to the 40,000 of to-day; and how the curse of labor ‘in the sweat of thy brow shalt thou eat bread,’ patiently endured, has carried you surely and steadily on in fulfillment of the Divine command, ‘to multiply and replenish the earth and subdue it.’ But there shall be nobler triumph than any over inanimate nature. Man himself shall be subdued to abhorrence of vice, of injustice, of violence; subdued to the sweet charities of life; subdued to all the requirements of duty and religion; subdued according to the law of human progress to the recognition of that gospel law by the side of which the moral is as the scaffolding upon the sacred temple—the law of human brotherhood. To labor for this end was man sent forth into the world. Not to the listlessness of idle perfections, but endowed with infinite capacities, inspired by infinite desires, and commanded to strive perpetually after excellence, amidst the encouragements of hope, the promise of final success, and the inexpressible delights which spring from its pursuing. Thus does the law of human progress assert eternal providence, and justify the ways of God to men.”

CHAPTER XIX.

AGRICULTURE AND HORTICULTURE.

WASHTENAW COUNTY AGRICULTURAL AND HORTICULTURAL SOCIETY.

Washtenaw county is distinguished for its agricultural productions. The county was originally settled mostly by men trained in agricultural pursuits, the larger part being immigrants from the State of New York. They brought with them but little capital,—in many instances only sufficient to buy the land upon which they located. But, however, they brought that which is better than money—industrious habits; and, under the guiding influence of a superior intelligence, they soon brought their lands into a high state of cultivation, so that to-day Washtenaw county occupies the proud position of being the first in the State in point of agricultural interests. This grand achievement is due, in a great measure, to the interest taken by her citizens in agricultural societies. Early in its history a society was formed, in which her leading farmers and artisans for a time took a lively interest, but, like many organizations of the kind, it suspended operations, yielding to the old-fogy way of doing things. The idea that 10 bushels of wheat to the acre was about all that could be expected, and that book farming was nonsense, seemed to take possession of the minds of many of what were then called good farmers. A cow that would weigh 500 or 600 pounds and give six or eight quarts of milk daily, and worth in the market $10 or $15, was looked upon as a very remarkable animal. A sheep that would yield two and a half or three pounds of wool, worth 25 or 30 cents a pound, was considered a profitable acquisition to the stock of the farm. Now, under the improved state of things, due, in part, to agricultural associations, a yield of 25 or 30 bushels of wheat per acre is shown; cows are exhibited that turn the scales at 1,400 pounds, and give 18 or 20 quarts of milk per day, and that sell in the market from $50 to $100. Sheep are also placed on exhibition which yield eight or nine pounds of wool each, which brings in the market 40 or 50 cents per pound.

The present agricultural society was formed in 1848, but owing to a loss of records from that date to 1868, but a meager account of its operations can be given. Its first president was Hon. William Finley, who held the office for some years, and did much to advance its interests. Prof. Agnew was its first secretary, and served two or three years. He was succeeded by Lorenzo Davis, who filled the office eight years.

The first fair was held in 1848, in the house and yard now occupied by the Catholic school, in Ann Arbor. It was but a small affair compared with many that have since been held.

For several years following, the annual exhibitions of the society were held at Ann Arbor, Ypsilanti and Dexter. The interest finally becoming so general, it was deemed best to purchase land in Ann Arbor for the use of the society and its permanent location. The proposition was strongly opposed in some parts of the county. The land now owned and occupied by the society was purchased in 1859 and a deed secured in 1870.

Among the presidents of the society prior to 1868, were Joshua G. Leland, Horace Carpenter, Hiram Arnold and Henry Warner.

The 20th annual fair was held on the society's grounds, the first week in October. The amount of the receipts was $2,045.55. D. M. Finley was Superintendent of grounds and buildings during this fair. Calvin Wheeler was President, and N. M. Schoff, Secretary.

At the annual meeting held Dec. 15, 1868, officers for the ensuing year were elected as follows: Sampson Parker, President; John J. Robison, James J. Parshall, Hiram Arnold, Randolph Davis, M. H. Goodrich, Vice-Presidents; N. M. Schoff, Secretary; D. Cramer, Cor. Secretary; Stephen M. Webster, Treasurer. The fair for this year was held the last week in September.

The annual meeting of the society for 1869, was held Dec. 21. Lyman S. Woods was elected President; Sampson Parker, David M. Uhl, John G. Koch, Joshua G. Leland, Robert McCall, Vice-Presidents; D. Cramer, Recording Secretary; Elihu B. Pond, Cor. Secretary; Stephen M. Webster, Treasurer. On the 6th of April, 1870, the managers of the society held a meeting at the secretary's office, in Ann Arbor. In regard to the title, the committee recommended the society to get an enabling act so as to remove all doubts from the mind of the purchaser, in case the society should ever be disposed to sell its property. The annual fair was held October 5, 6 and 7, the receipts of which amounted to $2,020, but not sufficient to meet expenses by $140.

The 23d annual meeting was held Dec. 20, 1870, at which time the following named officers were elected: Lyman S. Wood, President; D. M. Uhl, Sampson Parker, John G. Koch, Joshua G. Leland, G. A. Peters, Vice-Presidents; D. M. Finley, Recording Secretary; Lorenzo Davis, Corresponding Secretary; S. M. Webster, Treasurer. The annual fair was held Oct. 4, 5 and 6, 1871, the receipts amounting to $2,151. During this year improvements were made, to the grounds, including the building of Floral Hall, amounting to $1,438. This entailed an indebtedness on the society amounting to $1,138.

The 24th annual meeting for the election of officers was held at Ann Arbor on the 19th of December, 1871, resulting as follows: Isaac M. Whittaker, President; George C. Arms, John V. N. Gregory, James J. Parshall, David Cody, David M. Uhl, Vice-Presidents; David M. Finley, Recording Secretary; Lorenzo Davis, Corresponding Secretary; Stephen M. Webster, Treasurer. The fair was held the first week in October, and was said to have been the best in the previous history of the society. The new floral hall building added much to the convenience of exhibitors.

Dec. 17, 1872, the society again met for the election of officers, which election resulted as follows: John J. Robison, President; Edward L. Boyden, John Lowrey, J. G. Leland, Jacob H. Hicks, Morgan O'Brien, Vice-Presidents; David M. Finley, Recording Secretary; Lorenzo Davis, Corresponding Secretary; James J. Parshall, Treasurer. The fair was held in the latter part of September, 1873.

The election of officers was held Dec. 16, 1873, resulting as follows: John J. Robison, President; J. G. Leland, George A. Peters, B. Spencer, David Cody, G. N. B. Renwick, Vice-Presidents; J. E. Sumner, Recording Secretary; Lorenzo Davis, Corresponding Secretary; James J. Parshall, Treasurer. The annual fair was held the last week in September, 1874. Never before were there such a fine lot of cattle on exhibition. The number of sheep was so large that it necessitated the building of additional pens. There were 280 entries of horses in the different classes.

The 27th annual meeting was held Dec. 5, 1874; J. G. Leland was elected President; Sampson Parker, George A. Peters, Hiram Arnold, William H. Dell, D. M. Uhl, Vice-Presidents; William A. Lovejoy, Recording Secretary; Lorenzo Davis, Corresponding Secretary; J. J. Parshall, Treasurer. The annual fair was held on the grounds of the society the last week in September, 1875. It was quite successful, although the weather on the first day was very unfavorable.

Dec. 20, 1875, the annual meeting was again held, the choice for officers resulting in the election of Philip Bach, President; J. G. Leland, D. M. Uhl, Sampson Parker, George A. Peters, W. H. Dell, Vice-Presidents; William A. Lovejoy, Recording and Corresponding Secretary; J. J. Parshall, Treasurer. Mr. Bach, declining to serve as President, Sampson Parker was afterward elected to fill the vacancy. Wesley Canfield was elected Vice-President to fill the vacancy occasioned by the election of Mr. Parker to the presidency. At a meeting held Aug. 26, 1876, L. C. Risdon was elected Vice-President to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Mr. Leland. The annual fair was held in September, 1876.

The society again met for the election of officers Dec. 18, 1876. The following named were chosen: Sampson Parker, President; C. H. Richmond, Hiram Arnold, George W. Phelps, E. D. Lay, Jesse Warner, Vice-Presidents; W. A. Lovejoy, Recording and Corresponding Secretary; J. J. Parshall, Treasurer.

At an adjourned meeting of the society, held Feb. 24, 1877, on motion of John J. Robison, a committee of four were appointed to submit to the officers of the Eastern Michigan Agricultural Society a proposition with reference to consolidating the two fairs. John J. Robison, Sampson Parker, J. W. Wing and George W. Phelps were appointed the committee. After consultation, they made the following report:

To the officers and members of the Eastern Michigan [Agricultural and Mechanical Society]:

Believing that the best interests of the two agricultural societies organized and doing business in the county, would be greatly enhanced by a proper consolidation of said societies; therefore, we, the undersigned, committee of the Washtenaw Agricultural and Horticultural Society, for the purpose of presenting this proposition, would respectfully request your society to take steps to effect this consolidation, either by a joint meeting of the executive committees of the two societies, or otherwise, as you may think best.

The report was accepted, and, after discussion, adopted, when the same committee, on motion, were appointed to meet with the Eastern Michigan Agricultural and Mechanical Society. The committee performed the duty required of them, and on the 13th of March, 1877, the executive committees of both societies met and adopted the following preamble and resolution:

WHEREAS, We believe it will be the interest of each society that they shall not hold their meetings upon the same year; therefore be it

Resolved, That the Executive Committees of each society, here present, agree that the Eastern Michigan Agricultural and Mechanical Association shall hold a fair at Ypsilanti next fall, and that the Washtenaw County Agricultural and Horticultural Society shall hold a fair during the fall of 1878, at Ann Arbor, and that their fairs shall be held alternately thereafter each year for six years; and that at whichever place the fair shall be held the other society shall give their general attendance and assistance to such society; and that all the moneys and proceeds arising from the holding of a fair shall belong to and be the property of the association holding the same, and subject entirely to their control.

According to the foregoing recommendation, no fair was held at Ann Arbor in the fall of 1877, but during the summer the grand stand was built, at a cost of $615.

The annual meeting for this year was held Dec. 18, 1877, at which time Sampson Parker was elected President; David M. Uhl, M. H. Goodrich, Daniel Le Baron, George S. Wheeler, George A. Peters, Vice-Presidents; W. A. Lovejoy, Rec. Secretary; Lorenzo Davis, Cor. Secretary; J. J. Parshall, Treasurer. The fair for 1878 was held October 1, 2, 3 and 4. The receipts at this fair were $3,045.

At the annual meeting in December, 1878, the following named were elected officers for the year: Sampson Parker, President; J. S. Henderson, J. Vanatta, J. J. Jedele, D. M. Uhl, D. G. Rose, Vice-Presidents; Byron Green, Rec. Secretary; E. H. Scott, Cor.

Secretary; J. J. Parshall, Treasurer. The arrangement made two years previous, by which the Eastern Michigan and Washtenaw county fairs were to be held alternately at Ypsilanti and Ann Arbor, it was thought best to abandon, and the time of the annual fair was set for Sept. 30, and Oct. 1, 2 and 3, 1879. The fair was not as successful as other years on account of bad weather. The receipts were $2,274.

At the annual meeting held in December, 1879, Sampson Parker was elected President; E. T. Walker, J. W. Wing, D. L. Godfrey, David Cody, John S. Nowland, Vice-Presidents; N. M. Schöff, Rec. Secretary; William R. Henderson, Cor. Secretary; J. J. Parshall, Treasurer.

At a meeting of the Executive Committee, at Ann Arbor, March 13, 1880, the president, secretary and treasurer were authorized to issue bonds of the society to the amount of $3,000, due in eight years, the proceeds of which would be applied on indebtedness.

The fair for this year was held Sept. 28, 29, 30 and Oct. 1.

At the annual meeting Dec. 21, 1880, the following named officers were chosen: E. T. Walker, President; J. W. Wing, J. D. Baldwin, David Cody, Martin Cook, W. B. Thompson, Vice-Presidents; John N. Bailey, Rec. Secretary; D. M. Finley, Cor. Secretary; Willard B. Smith, Treasurer.

The society owns 22½ acres of ground within the city limits of Ann Arbor, on which there is a floral hall, grand stand, agricultural hall, secretary and treasurer's office, barns, stalls, sheds and other conveniences. There is also a good half-mile track. Successive rains during the week of fair for several years, together with the large amount of money expended in buildings and keeping the grounds in order, have caused an indebtedness against the society which should be met by the citizens of the county, and especially of Ann Arbor.

A history of the operation of this society would not be complete without special mention of some of those who have contributed to its success. Among these are William Finley, its first President; D. M. Uhl, George Sutton, William S. Maynard, Joshua G. Leland, Lyman S. Wood, Sampson Parker, Horace Carpenter, John Nowland, E. T. Walker, J. J. Parshall, Lorenzo Davis, William H. Dell, David Cody, Gen. Asa Williams, Newton Sheldon, Moses Rogers, I. N. S. Foster, William Finley and others. Mr. Parshall served as Treasurer for nine consecutive years, and gave much time to the work.

WASHTENAW POMOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

Mr. J. Austin Scott, of Ann Arbor, Vice-President of the Michigan State Pomological Society for Washtenaw county, in May, 1878, invited the fruit men of said county, through the Ann Arbor papers, to hold a meeting at Ann Arbor, for the purpose of organizing a pomological society.

The call was well received by the fruit-loving people of the county, and in June, 1878, the first meeting was held.

J. D. Baldwin, of Ann Arbor, was chosen chairman, and Emil Bauer, of same place, secretary of the meeting. The meeting was well attended, and composed of the most intelligent fruit-growers of the county.

The meeting was addressed by Messrs. S. W. Dorr, J. Austin Scott, Jacob Ganzhorn, C. G. Clark, and others. This county was unanimously acknowledged to be one of the best in the State for fruit purposes. A strong enthusiasm was manifested by all present favoring the organization of a county pomological society. The peach received the lion's share of attention in this meeting.

Judge Edwin Lawrence, C. G. Clark, and Jacob Ganzhorn were chosen a committee to draw up a constitution and by-laws, and to report at next meeting. The meeting then adjourned for four weeks.

June Meeting, 1878.—The committee on a constitution and by-laws submitted articles of association, which, after a few amendments, were adopted. The following officers were then elected by ballot, to serve one year: President, Judge Edwin Lawrence, Ann Arbor; Vice-Presidents, S. W. Dorr, Manchester; E. S. Boyden, Webster; E. D. Lay, Ypsilanti; Secretary, Dr. W. W. Nichols, Ann Arbor; Treasurer, J. J. Parshall, Ann Arbor; Executive Committee—J. Austin Scott, Ann Arbor; F. F. Tucker, Chelsea; C. H. Woodruff, Ann Arbor; William P. Grooves, Northfield.

C. H. Woodruff displayed two very fine plates of seedling strawberries (no name) of his own raising, which he claimed to be as productive as the Wilson, but sweeter, and holding out larger in the last picking.

The society decided to discuss the apple at the next meeting, and J. C. Rouse, of Pittsfield, was requested to furnish a paper on the subject.

August Meeting, 1878.—At this meeting Mr. J. C. Rouse presented his paper on the apple and its cultivation, which was highly endorsed by J. J. Parshall, of Ann Arbor, who said it agreed with his own experience.

Mr. William P. Grooves made a few remarks on pruning trees. He said the best plan was to prune every year. He also said his plan was to leave the most limbs on the southwest side of the tree, so as to better withstand the heavy winds which prevail from that quarter.

Mr. Jacob Ganzhorn then followed in the discussion and spoke at length on the subject. In the course of his remarks he said he favored thorough cultivation of small orchards—till they are well established at least—and had no objections to hoed crops being grown in the orchards during the time. He made some good remarks in regard to the pruning of trees.

Mr. J. Austin Scott took the floor next and gave the society some interesting experiences of his with two orchards of fruits, which he used to own back in Ohio. He believed that Michigan was the best apple State in the Union.

A discussion then arose between Messrs. Scott, Grooves and Clark upon the merits of the Baldwin apple for market purposes and home consumption. Mr. Scott did not believe the Baldwin would be a very desirable apple in the future, while Messrs. Grooves and Clark spoke in favor of the Baldwin, in regard to its bearing qualities, as well as those heretofore mentioned.

The peach was made the subject of the next meeting, and J. D. Baldwin was invited to prepare a paper on this topic.

September Meeting, 1878.—Mr. Baldwin was President, and as previously requested, addressed the society on the cultivation of the peach. He favored the plan of planting the peach-trees in an orchard of themselves, believing it to be more profitable. He explained to the meeting his ideas of planting an orchard of this kind, which were very interesting, and attentively listened to by the society. Mr. Baldwin also spoke of the advantages of this society to the fruit-growers in the way of saving money, by united action on peach baskets.

October Meeting, 1878.—This meeting was mainly occupied by the election of officers, being the annual meeting; the following officers were elected for the ensuing year: President—J. Austin Scott, Ann Arbor; Vice-Presidents—J. D. Baldwin, Ann Arbor; S. W. Dorr, Manchester; J. C. Rouse, Pittsfield township; Secretary—Jacob Ganzhorn, Ann Arbor; Treasurer—J. J. Parshall, Ann Arbor; Executive Board—F. F. Tucker, Chelsea; William C. Grooves, Northfield township; Charles H. Woodruff, Ann Arbor; N. B. Covert, Ann Arbor.

Mr. Jacob Ganzhorn read a paper on the strawberry, raspberry, blackberry, currant, gooseberry, grape, quince, pear, cherry and plum.

November Meeting, 1878.—The pear was the subject selected for discussion.

Mr. Everett H. Scott read a paper on this topic, speaking of the soil, pruning, and cultivation of this delicious fruit. He was followed by Messrs. N. B. Covert, J. D. Baldwin, President Scott, J. J. Parshall and Jacob Ganzhorn, all of whom gave the meeting their experience in the raising and cultivation of this fruit.

January Meeting, 1879.—This meeting was largely occupied by reports of the annual meeting of the State Pomological Society held in December, 1878, at Paw Paw, by S. W. Dorr and J. D. Baldwin, who were delegates from this society.

N. B. Covert made a few remarks about the apple, followed by S. W. Dorr upon the same subject. He favored the planting of peas in the fruit orchards. Mr. Baldwin being called upon for a few remarks about the soil suitable for peaches, said that he would rather pay $100 per acre for clay land for growing the peach upon than to take sandy soil for nothing. He wanted nothing to do with sandy soil for the peach. He added that the location of a peach orchard should have perfect air-drainage.

February Meeting, 1879.—The society met with the Farmers' Club on Feb. 15. The subjects discussed were mainly pertaining to farming.

March Meeting, 1879.—In this meeting the Farmers' Club met with this society, the discussions covering farm and fruit topics. Mr. S. W. Dorr, who was a delegate from this society to the State Pomological Society, held at Lausing, made a report upon the same in writing, and also read a paper on the disease of the peach, and on the depredations of the curculio. Mr. Dorr received the thanks of the society for his interesting report on the Lansing meeting, and for his able paper on the peach and plum. A discussion then followed in regard to nurserymen, after which, the president advised the society to buy only of reliable nurserymen. Mr. Dorr's paper spoke about the yellows in the peach, and J. D. Baldwin cautioned the society to buy only where the yellows did not exist. A short discussion on the depredations committed by lawless people in stealing fruit followed. A fine display of apples from several members of the society were on exhibition, and were admired very much.

April Meeting, 1879.—This meeting was chiefly devoted to the discussion of the cultivation of small fruits.

A paper on this subject was read by the Rev. Benjamin Day. He recommended their cultivation to all who have gardens. He contrasted the new and improved varieties with the old, much to the detriment of the latter. He spoke for some time upon the cultivating process. He was followed by J. D. Baldwin, who made some remarks on the cultivation of the raspberry.

President Scott said he would defend the cultivation of the apple. He said it had been the leading fruit for the past 40 years, and believed it would be the same in the future. Mr. N. B. Covert gave his observations on the tent caterpillar and other insects injurious to the apple. Mr. J. D. Baldwin arose again, and spoke of the peach borer, so injurious to that fruit. A fine display of apples was made at the meeting by Mr. D. L. Godfrey.

May Meeting, 1879.—At this meeting Mr. A. W. Toms made a fine display of plants in bloom. Mr. Covert contributed a paper on birds, which called out some discussion on the question whether the robin was a useful bird to the fruit-grower or not. Mr. Ganzhorn read an extended paper on the cultivation of fruit, advocating thorough culture, with proper restriction to allow the wood of the new growth to ripen. Mr. Baldwin then made a few remarks upon the cultivation of the peach.

June Meeting, 1879.—This meeting was well attended, about as many ladies being present as gentlemen. The strawberry and its culture, and an exhibition of this fruit, was the main work of this meeting, per programme. The display of strawberries constituted the principal attraction of the meeting. Mr. Baldwin opened the discussion on this luscious berry, and was followed by Charles H. Woodruff, who spoke mainly on the seedling strawberry. He showed several varieties of these which were very fine. President Scott then spoke a few minutes on this valuable fruit. A committee of three were appointed to examine the fruit on exhibition, and after a ten minutes' recess, reported on the 16 plates displayed. Report received by society. N. B. Covert next read a paper on ornithology. Mrs. N. H. Pierce read a poem, entitled "Small Things," which was liked very much. Remarks were then made by Mr. J. D. Baldwin on the peach rot, and by N. B. Covert, on curculio. Some specimens of fine dried apples were then distributed to the society, by the secretary, being a present from Mr. Williams, of Grand Haven.

August Meeting, 1879.—The secretary read circulars from the secretary of the State Pomological Society, regarding their annual exhibition to be held at Detroit, in September, 1879. President Scott made an earnest appeal to the society to be represented at the State fair. The secretary then read an extended paper on the fruit interest of the county, which was very interesting and showed the interest and energy displayed by the fruit-growers of this county. The president alluded to the successful peach culture of Judge Lawrence, and of the extensive fruit operation of J. D. Baldwin, wishing that the society might take notice, and help to raise the standard of fruit culture.

September Meeting, 1879.—At this meeting C. H. Woodruff presented the society with a fine display of white and black seedling grapes, and also some choice peaches. After this, Mrs. Pierce read an essay, which was received with much delight. The president, after asking the vice-president to take the chair, spoke at some length upon his labors with a like society in Ohio for 20 years; touched upon the fruit interest of the county, believed it to be one of the most important, and concluded by saying that Washtenaw county was destined to be one of the most flourishing fruit counties in the State. Judge Page here took the floor, and made a few remarks on the importance of the peach crop, and urged their more extended cultivation. Prof. Bauer then arose and said he believed that in future fruit-growing ought to become a separate business from farming. He also said that fruit-growers must be cautious in advising others to embark in this business, who had seen but little experience.

Mr. Covert said he believed apple-growing paid twice as much as any other branch of agriculture, and concluded his remarks with a glorious tribute to the genuine pomologist, for being ever ready, and always generous with the knowledge he possessed, to aid his friends in this noble work.

The president then spoke in regard to fruit orchards of all kinds, and hoped the day was not far distant when every farmer would have one of them, with plenty of small fruits.

Prof. Bauer remarked for a few minutes on the excellency of the Catawba grape for market purposes, and closed by saying he believed the fruit-man could grow the fruit for the farmer better and cheaper.

October Meeting, 1879.—This meeting was mostly taken up by the election of officers for the ensuing year. An entertaining paper was read by Mrs. Pierce.

November Meeting, 1879.—The canker worm was the topic of discussion at this meeting, and some good remarks were made by the different members on the subject.

CHAPTER XX.

THE PRESS.

Among the professions none have taken a higher rank than that of journalism, and the position of an editor on one of the great dailies, or on one of the leading magazines, or even the small country weekly, is not to be despised. The newspaper, the editor, the reporter, and the compositor are the Archimedean levers which move the world. Their character and doctrines fashion public opinion, and their defeats and triumphs become matters of history. Their jests may become stale and their principles exchanged by the minority for passing attractions; their enemies may forgive and friends forget, yet through all these vicissitudes of life, through the mass of inconsistencies malevolent human nature cultivates, the universal verdict of mankind renders to their agencies an infinite good.

Important affairs may at times be mismanaged, but they are never misunderstood, and their accomplishment is never attempted by a perverted or dishonest ingenuity. There is certainly no profession or professional representative who is more entitled to the fullest complement of moral support than journalism and the journalist. He is the weathercock of public opinion, and must be firm and upright amidst swaying interests and perilous exigencies. His thoughts must not be blinded by personal considerations, but left free to adjudicate questions of grave import to humanity, as safely, clearly and effectually as the purest judge upon the bench. Such must the editor be—a man true to himself, his race and his God. Of such material must he be composed, if he would dictate a policy or direct an administration which will live in history as the mark and model of its time.

The newspapers of Washtenaw county, from the issue of the first number of the Michigan Emigrant, the pioneer journal of the county, have generally ranked high with the press of the country. Perhaps the newspapers of no section of the Northern States wield a more potent and beneficent influence than those of Washtenaw county. To them is due much credit for the rapid strides made by the people in developing to such high state the natural resources of this county; in building beautiful villages and thriving cities; in the progress enjoyed in all branches of legitimate business; in securing the extraordinary educational advantages, and in molding the social status of the people of the county, which is of a much higher character than found in most sections of the Northwest. The gentlemen who have from time to time labored at the helm of the various papers recorded in this chapter, we again repeat, deserve no little praise for their services rendered in making one of the very first counties in Michigan out of the wilderness of a half century ago. The paper issued from the various presses of the county to-day stand foremost among the city and provincial papers of the State. Those in charge have uniformly evinced a fair degree of journalistic ability, while some have proven themselves to have been endowed with that rare and peculiar genius occasionally found in the editor's chamber.

One of the most interesting and important features in the history of Washtenaw county, is its newspapers, and it has been our endeavor to deal with the subject fairly, fully and impartially. Our plan will be to give a sketch of each paper ever published in the various cities and villages, in their chronological order.

ANN ARBOR PAPERS.

The Western Emigrant.—On Wednesday, Nov. 18, 1829, The Western Emigrant was first issued at Ann Arbor. The pioneer paper of Washtenaw county in size and general make-up is hardly to be compared with the press of to-day. It was a five-column folio, and edited and published by Thomas Simpson. The first number contained the Declaration of Independence, articles on hemp, tobacco, "To make Cement for Broken Glass," Thanksgiving Proclamation of Gov. Cass, a Salutatory Letter from the Editor, two communications on the country, several items of general news, foreign and domestic, advertisement of Territorial Laws, and a Moral and Religious Department. The paper also contained advertisements of L. Hawley, Nash & Co., Edward Clark, John Allen & Co., Benjamin Sutton, Administrator, Select School, by T. W. and Moses Merrill, Israel Branch and Castle Southerland. The editor in his salutatory says: "It shall be the constant aim of the editor to promote correct principles, and exhibit impartial information relative to the merit and qualifications of candidates for important public offices. Whenever the public good requires it, public men and measures shall be freely and fearlessly canvassed. He will espouse constitutional principles, advocate and enforce a plain system of political common sense." The letter from the editor assures Hon. Samuel W. Dexter that the columns of the Emigrant will be open to the discussion of Freemasonry and Anti-Masonry. The advertisement of L. Hawley, Nash & Co. informs the public they "have erected a distillery in the vicinity of Ann Arbor, and will keep constantly on hand a superior quality of rectified whisky, which they will sell as low as can be purchased in the Territory." Gen. Clark advertises for "a few thousands bushel of grain, for which a fair price will be paid in goods or whisky." To those who know the General's strong temperance principles this will seem strange, but it must be remembered in the good old days whisky was regarded as a necessity which no one could do without. In the second issue A. & D. B. Brown have a column advertisement in which they enumerate the goods they have in stock, and close with the same announcement as made by Gen. Clark, that they have "any quantity of superior rectified whisky at twenty-five cents per gallon by the barrel, for cash. Also, whisky exchanged for grain at the highest rates."

Mr. Simpson's connection with the Emigrant was only of five weeks' duration, when he disposed of the paper to Samuel W. Dexter and John Allen, who made it an Anti-Masonic organ, dealing powerful blows at what they considered a crime against good government. In their salutatory, the editors remark: "We are Anti-Masons, and what are commonly called political Anti-Masons. We know no other consistent Anti-Masonry. A highly important era has been developed—a secret society, embracing much of the talent and wealth, and most of the political information of the Union, which (if we may trust its advocates) has existed from time immemorial, seeing everything, but itself unseen, hearing, knowing everything, but itself unknown, reaching everything, but invulnerable because invisible, its ramifications extending throughout every department of society, 'possessing power wherever power is valuable,' binding Europe and America together. This society has been brought to light; its most secret cells thrown open to view; and we trust the development will be an everlasting warning against secret combinations." Appealing for support it says: "Anti-Masons of the Territory of Michigan, we ask your support. We here unfurl the Anti-Masonic banner; we shall be proud to see you standing by its defense. Anti-Masons of the county of Washtenaw, we look to you for support; we trust you will not desert the good cause, that you will not be lukewarm when your rights are at stake." The Emigrant during its existence never wavered in its advocacy of Anti-Masonic principles. About the commencement of its second volume Mr. Dexter became sole proprietor of the paper, and in connection with John Allen and George Corselius, had editorial control. An enlargement of the Emigrant took place on the commencement of the third volume, and Mr. Allen retired from the editorial corps. The paper afterward passed into the hands of George Corselius, who changed its name to the Michigan Emigrant and advocated Whig principles. The conclusion of the fourth volume was the last of the Emigrant, but was succeeded by the Michigan Whig, by the same editor and publisher, its first number bearing date Dec. 4, 1834. This change was not approved of by Mr. Dexter, who was the real, though not the nominal, owner of the office, and to that name that of Washtenaw Democrat was soon after added. The Whig and Democrat continued to be published by Mr. Corselius until September, 1835, when the establishment passed into the hands of George W. Wood & Co., who changed its name to the State Journal,—Continuing its publication under that name. In his introduction the editor says: "The political character of the State Journal shall be truly Republican. It will maintain the rights of the States on the one hand, and the integrity of the Union on the other, by seeking to confine both parties to their respective sphere of action." Continuing, the editor remarks: "Our humble efforts shall, at times, be exerted in the cause of equal rights; of civil and political liberty; of true Republican principles of the constitution; in opposition to the ultra doctrines, new-fangled theories and novel interpretations of new-school Democrats, who now occupy the 'chief places in the synagogne.'" Temperance, agriculture, and other useful information were to find a place in the columns of the paper. The modesty and humility of the editor was set forth in the following language: "Good selections will generally be preferred for the columns of the Journal before our own cogitations, emphatically dubbed editorials, which occupy so conspicuous a place in most of the weekly publications of the day, believing as we do in the sentiment we once heard expressed by an editor of twenty years' experience, that 'he could make a better paper with his shears than his pen.'" After eight weeks Mr. Wood's partner retired, and the paper was continued by George W. Wood, who also carried a stock of books and stationery in connection. In April, 1836, the paper was purchased by Dr. F. Drake, who continued in charge for about one year. In March, 1837, Edwin Lawrence became editor and publisher, and proposed to make the paper politically independent. In his salutatory Mr. Lawrence said: "It will require no extraordinary discernment to perceive that a strict adherence to party and an unqualified support of any measure which the policy or interest of partisan leaders may dictate, is the utter annihilation of that independence and fearlessness of character which truth, justice, and the rights of the people ever demand. Such an obsequiousness to party dictation may indeed tend to confirm the measures, and give a present transient luster to all the acts of their supporters, but will soon end in a wreck of liberty itself, in which light and trifling things of party may survive, but everything solid and substantial will be lost forever. Were we compelled thus to support indiscriminately any measure which any party might see fit to impose upon us, and shout glory and praise to their authors, while our bosom was burning with shame and indignation, or filled with absolute disgust and abhorrence at the very act we were, in obedience to party discipline, lauding to the skies, we would relinquish forever any and every station that requires for its enjoyment such a sacrifice of freedom for the unsatisfying pleasure of office or power." Mr. Lawrence continued to ably discharge the duties of editor and publisher until May, 1839, when the paper and good will of the office was disposed of to Franklin Sawyer, Jr., who changed the name of the paper to Michigan State Journal, and continued its publication, making it a distinctive Whig paper. Mr. Sawyer was a talented man and succeeded in making the Journal one of the best papers published in the State. In the great campaign of 1840 it advocated the election of William Henry Harrison to the presidency with great vigor. Mr. Sawyer continued his connection as editor until 1841, but had in the meantime disposed of the office to T. M. Ladd. On the retirement of Mr. Sawyer from editorial labor, Mr. Ladd discharged for a while the duties of both editor and publisher. In March, 1842, Edwin Lawrence again assumed editorial control, though not connected with the publication of the paper. He remained in this connection one year, when the publisher resumed the editorial work of the paper. In February, 1844, George Cor-selius took editorial charge and remained until April, 1845. Shortly after this Mr. Ladd disposed of the office to L. C. Goodale and S. B. McCracken, who continued the publication of the Journal. Mr. McCracken disposed of his interest in the spring of 1846, and Mr. Goodale became sole owner.

ANN ARBOR ARGUS.

The publication of this paper under the name of Michigan Argus was commenced January, 1835, by E. P. Gardner, who continued it as the organ of the Democracy of the county until 1840. It was a six-column folio, wide measure, about equal to an ordinary seven-column paper. In the last year mentioned a stock company purchased the office and placed it in charge of Orrin Arnold, who ran it for a time, when it sold a half interest, and the paper was continued by Arnold & Powell, the latter remaining but a few months, when he disposed of his interest to a Mr. Smith, the firm name being Arnold & Smith. Soon after the last firm formed a partnership, its name was changed to that of Free Democrat. The latter paper continued to exist but a short time, when L. W. Cole and E. P. Gardner, under the firm name of Cole & Gardner, again commenced the publication of the Argus. The press on which the Argus was printed by Cole & Gardner for several years was made by H. & R. Partridge, and was the first and only iron press ever built in Michigan. The inscription on it read "Manufactured by H. & R. Partridge, for L. W. Cole, Ann Arbor, Mich., February, 1844." "The new series of the Argus began at the time," says Mr. Cole, in a letter to Lorenzo Davis, "with Judicial Reform," when the present circuit court system was completely set aside. I called it a 'Judicial Revolution,' which it was; and the Argus, from the first issue, fought it until it was wiped out and dead. I suffered some for the course I pursued, but I was amply rewarded for my firmness afterward. The thing that was established was no 'reform;' it was a senseless revolution. It took some nerve, I confess, to stand the pressure brought to bear upon me, and for several months my subscription list only numbered about 50. To see about 80 of my own party marching to the polls under the banner of 'Reform,' instigated by Dr. Denton and John Allen, and vote against Judge Felch and the Democratic ticket, gave me serious thoughts of the course I was about to take. But good counsel, such as Judges Mundy, Miles, Fletcher, Wilson and others, and my own sense of what should be done, determined me to go ahead, and I did, to the end of the foolish thing. When I sold to E. B. Pond, we were publishing about 1,800 copies."

In reference to Mr. Gardner, who was so long connected with the publication of the Argus, Mr. Cole says, in the same connection. "My partner, Mr. Gardner, whose memory I shall always cherish with the kindest feelings, you know as much about, almost, as I do. He was the first to sign the Martha Washington pledge in Ann Arbor, and so far as I know, he never in the least deviated from it. He died as he lived—an honest man, a Christian, and one of the best temperance men."

In July, 1854, Cole & Gardner disposed of the Argus to Elihu B. Pond, who remained its sole editor and proprietor for a period of nearly 24 years. Under the management of Mr. Pond, the Argus was recognized as one of the leading Democratic papers in the State. When the rebels committed the first overt act against the Government, in 1861, Mr. Pond, in an able editorial, said: "If the South has been calculating on Northern aid to subvert the Government and degrade the national flag, it is doubtless now convinced of its mistake. The promptness with which the men of all parties, throughout the whole North, have responded to the Government, must satisfy the Southern fanatics and traitors that Democrats will not enlist with them in a crusade against the Union to reward them for breaking up the Democratic party. Democrats have always stood by their Southern brethren and struck manful blows in defense of their constitutional rights, but they will never, NEVER, NEVER help them break up the Government and plant an oligarchy in its stead."

Elihu B. Pond, for so long editor of the Argus, was born in Wilmington, Essex county, New York, July 15, 1826. He is the son of Jared and Stalira (Bartlet) Pond. In 1832, in company with his parents, he removed to Knox county, Ohio, and in 1835, to Michigan, locating in the village of Branch, then the county-seat of Branch county. In May, 1843, his parents having removed to Coldwater, which had then become the county-seat of Branch county, he entered the office of the Coldwater Sentinel and served as an apprentice three years, continuing then in the office as a journeyman printer until the fall of that year, when he started out on his first "tramp," working his way as far south as Cincinnati, Ohio. Returning to Michigan in the spring of 1847, he entered the Wesleyan Seminary, now Albion College, at Albion, and "completed" his education in two terms. In May, 1848, he purchased the Coldwater Sentinel, and published that paper six years. The Sentinel, under his editorial control, was the only Democratic paper in Michigan which took a decided stand against the repeal of the Missouri Compromise and the Kansas-Nebraska Bill, and predicted, as a result of such legislation, the disaster which overtook the Democratic party in State and Nation. As already stated Mr. Pond purchased the office of the Michigan Argus in 1854, taking possession July 1st. He continued as editor and proprietor until Dec. 31, 1878, save from Oct. 1, 1874. to Dec. 31, 1875, when it was leased to other parties.

Mr. Pond has served the public in various official positions. At Coldwater he was Village Clerk one year, and Director of the school district two years. At Ann Arbor he was School Director from September, 1857 until September, 1859, then Secretary of the School Board to September, 1865, and from January, 1873, to September, 1877, he was President of the School Board. In 1859-'60, he was Alderman from the 4th ward. From January, 1860, to January, 1867, he was clerk of Forest Hill Seminary, and has since that date served the same company as trustee three years, and in January, 1880, was again elected clerk. In November, 1858. he was elected Senator from the 7th Senatorial District (the northern half of Washtenaw county), running largely ahead of his ticket, and overcoming a large Republican majority. In 1864 he was elected County Clerk, and served one term. On the organization of the Michigan Press Association, in 1868, he was elected President and re-elected in 1869.

Mr. Pond was united in marriage Nov. 20, 1849, with Mary B. Allen, daughter of Stephen Allen, one of the oldest settlers in Lenawee county, by whom he has had five children—three sons and two daughters. One daughter and two sons survive. Both sons are graduates of the University of Michigan, in the classes of 1879 and 1880.

On the purchase of the office from Mr. Pond, in December, 1878, John N. Bailey, the new proprietor, changed the name of the paper from that of Michigan Argus to that of Ann Arbor Argus; but made no change in its size or in the political principles which it advocated. It is in this year of grace, 1881, advocating the same political principles that it did under the management of E. P. Gardner in the beginning, and for so many years under the able management of Mr. Pond. The present proprietor and editor, Mr. Bailey, is a strong and vigorous writer, and makes no uncertain sound in his political utterances.

John N. Bailey, editor and publisher of the Argus, was born in Adams, Jefferson county, New York, May 13, 1840. While attending the common school of his native State, he conceived the idea of becoming a printer, and at the age of 15 apprenticed himself to the firm of Ingalls & Stowell, editors and publishers of the Reformer, Watertown, New York. When his term expired, he entered Valley Seminary, Fulton, New York, with the view of preparing for college. Teaching district schools in winter and the endeavor by extra study to keep up with his classes for three years, broke down his health and temporarily weakened his eyes, so that by the advice of physicians he was obliged to abandon the cherished ambition of his life. After months of recuperation, in which health was partially restored, meantime localizing a daily paper, and working at the case, in Watertown, he was advised to abandon the "art preservative of all arts" for some other pursuit. He accordingly entered into trade at Clayton, New York, following the same for several years. While in Clayton he was married to Miss Sarah J. Esselstyn, in 1865, by whom he has had four children.

The desire to return to his chosen profession as soon as his health would permit, was uppermost in his mind. In 1869, he sold his business and removed to Auburn, New York, where he engaged in the conduct of the press until the autumn of 1878. On the 1st of January, 1879, he became editor and proprietor of the Argus. Politically, Mr. Bailey has always been a Democrat; religiously, a member of no Church, being liberal in his views.

Local News and Advertiser.—A paper bearing this name was established in Ann Arbor in 1857, the first number bearing date July 21. It was a five-column folio, and edited and published by S. B. McCracken. As its name indicates, it was designed as a local and advertising medium. It was well edited and received with favor by the public. On the 25th of August, 1858, it passed into the hands of Lorenzo Davis. While controlled by Mr. McCracken, the paper did not espouse the side of either of the existing parties, but when Mr. Davis became its publisher, it became the advocate of Republican principles. In January, 1859, the News was enlarged to a six-column folio, wide measure, equal to a seven-column folio ordinary size, and its name changed to Ann Arbor Local News. Aug. 28 it was again enlarged, making it an eight-column folio, and name changed to the Michigan State News, with E. A. Burlingame associated with Mr. Davis as publisher. This arrangement continued but about six months, Mr. Burlingame retiring and Mr. Davis remaining sole editor and proprietor. On the breaking out of the Rebellion, the News did much good in encouraging enlistments and upholding the defenders of the Government. It passed through the hard times of the first two years of civil war, but was forced to suspend just when a brighter era began to dawn.

ANN ARBOR COURIER.

This paper was commenced June 18, 1861, by C. G. Clark and W. D. Wiltsie, under the name of the Peninsular Courier. It was a seven-column folio, Union Republican in politics. In their "Introductory," the editors refer to the fact that nations rise, flourish and pass away, and still others come to fill their places; so in the sphere of newspapers, changes are ever going on, new combinations are being formed, and new aspirants for public favor appear and receive the approval or disapproval of the reading community. The Courier was placed in the long procession of newspapers that were taking daily or weekly steps towards oblivion. The paper was edited with ability and earnestly supported the Government in all its efforts to suppress the rebellion. In December, 1861, David

C. Holmes was admitted as a partner and the firm name of Clark, Wiltsie & Co. was adopted. At this time the Courier was consolidated with the Ypsilanti Herald, and for about two months the paper was published under the double name of Peninsular Courier and Ypsilanti Herald. When the latter name was dropped, the firm was changed to Clark, Wiltsie & Holmes. In the summer of 1862, Mr. Wiltsie and Mr. Holmes entered the service of the United States and the firm was therefore dissolved, Mr. Clark assuming the entire control of the paper as editor and publisher. In 1865 the paper was sold to Dr. A. W. Chase, who continued it until June, 1866, when its form was changed from a seven-column folio to a five column quarto. To its original name of Peninsular Courier that of Family Visitant was added. In November, 1866, John L. Knight became editor, Dr. Chase desiring to be relieved from editorial labor that he might give himself more fully to his fast increasing business as publisher of Dr. Chase's Receipt Book. This relation continued for about six months when Mr. Knight retired. In June, 1867, the paper was enlarged to a six-column quarto, with Allan Campbell in the editorial chair. In January, 1869, the old folio form was resumed and the paper considerably enlarged. A. W. Chase assumed editorial charge, with Chas. G. Clark, Jr., assistant. Ill health caused Dr. Chase to relinquish editorial control the following June, and William Wines was given charge. This arrangement continued about two months, when Dr. Chase sold the paper, together with his publishing business, to Rice A. Beal, the issue of the Courier for Sept. 3, 1869, containing the Doctor's valedictory and Mr. Beal's salutatory. C. G. Clark, Jr., became editor and continued in that relation until December, when Lorenzo Davis was placed in charge, remaining until April, 1870, when Mr. Beal assumed editorial charge, and has continued to be the responsible editor to the present time. In 1876 the name of the paper was changed from the Peninsular Courier and Family Visitant to the Ann Arbor Courier, a name which localizes it.

Rice A. Beal, the editor of the Courier, is a man of the people. He was born in Macedon, New York, Jan. 19, 1823, and is the son of Emery and Sophronia Beal. At the age of 10 years, with his parents, he removed to Washtenaw county, Michigan, and settled in the town of Lima, where he remained about three years, when he accompanied his parents to Livingston county. Here he grew to man's estate, working with his parents on the farm, toiling early and late, not with the hope of reward, but as an act of duty which he owed to his natural protectors. The common schools of the Territory and young State afforded him all the elementary education he obtained, with the exception of one year spent in the Albion Academy, in the State of New York. The first money ever earned by Mr. Beal was on a neighbor's farm, where he toiled for fifteen hours per day for the munificent sum of $5 per month. At the age of 21 he began life for himself, without a dollar in his pocket or to his credit. Teaching school for a time at $9 per month, he accumulated $40, with which he went to Ann Arbor and invested in notions and fancy goods, which he peddled through the country. This business he continued for 18 months, when he had saved enough to open a small store in the village of Pinckney, Livingston county, where he remained one summer, removing then to the village of Howell, in the same county, remaining in the latter place one year, at the expiration of which time he removed to Plainfield, where he remained six years. In 1853, he removed to the village of Dexter, Washtenaw county, where he continued the mercantile business. Possessed of an indomitable will and of an exceedingly hopeful disposition, with an abundance of energy, it is no wonder that success crowned his efforts. During the 12 years of his life in the village he was engaged in the mercantile, produce, milling and manufacturing and banking business, and was acknowledged leader in every enterprise in which he engaged.

In 1865 Mr. Beal, feeling that he had acquired a competency, sold out all his business interests in Dexter, and removed to the city of Ann Arbor, intending to live a retired life. But a man of his active temperament could not live a life of ease and inactivity; therefore, in 1869 he purchased the printing establishment of Dr. A. W. Chase, with all the Doctor's rights in the publication of Dr. Chase's Receipts, and immediately embarked in the publication business, including that of the Peninsular Courier. Having no experience in the business, some of his friends prophesied failure. With him there is no such word as fail. Being a practical business man, and possessed of an abundance of good, strong common sense, he brought his practical experience and common sense into the business, the result of which is that he has been successful in this new undertaking beyond his most ardent expectations.

There is one thing that has distinguished Mr. Beal among his fellows, and that is his championship of the poor. Beginning life himself as poor as the poorest, obtaining a competency not by any extraordinary streak of good luck, but by hard, earnest work, he knows what the poor have to suffer, and sympathizes with them in all their troubles, and to the deserving he is always willing to lend a helping hand. In proof of this, it is not necessary to call attention to but one act in his life—the defense of Dr. Rose, in the celebrated University Defalcation case. In the prosecution of this case Mr. Beal has spent an independent fortune, without hope of reward other than the consciousness of doing a righteous act. Single-handed and alone, he has fought against wealth, the best hired legal talent in the State, and the vindictive hatred of enemies, and in every stage of the case has come off more than conqueror.

As a politician, Mr. Beal in early life, and up to the beginning of the war of the Rebellion, was a Democrat of the "most strictest sect of the religion." When Southern men undertook, in the name of Democracy, to destroy the Government, he arrayed himself upon the side of the patriots, and became a thorough and consistent Republican. While always strong in the faith Mr. Beal has never sought public office, though, with his talents he would honor any office that might be bestowed upon him. He was a delegate to the convention that nominated U. S. Grant for the presidency the second term, and also the convention that nominated Rutherford B. Hayes to the same office. In 1876 he was made a member of the State Central Committee, and for the greater part of the time has been chairman of the executive committee. In 1880, without solicitation on his part, and after the canvass was nearly over, he was brought forward by his friends for the office of Governor of the State, the highest office in the gift of the people. At the convention, which assembled in Jackson, Aug. 5, 1880, in presenting the name of Mr. Beal, Captain E. P. Allen, of Washtenaw, said :

Mr. Chairman.—On the 27th day of July last, the Republicans in convention for the county of Washtenaw, a convention of 120 delegates, representing 6,000 Republican votes, passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That we earnestly request the delegates to the State Convention to use all honorable means first and last to secure the nomination of our fellow citizen, the Hon. Rice A. Beal, for Governor.

We believe that no citizen is more worthy of that high honor, and that none could fill the position with greater ability and be more watchful of the interests of the commonwealth. Mr. Chairman, if you ask who our candidate is I will say that you may take all the virtues, and all the honors and all the good things that have been said by all the speakers in favor of all the candidates and put them together, and that is our candidate. [Applause and cheers.] * * * *
The gentleman whose name is presented here is not a legislator. He is not a lawyer, nor a doctor: he comes from the people and is of the people. He is one of that class so numerous in the great State of Michigan, who have made it what it is, the grandest State in all this nation. [Applause.] He has worked his own way from comparative poverty to the position that he to-day occupies. [Applause.] * *

He has his faults. If I thought we were going to nominate a man who has no faults, I should vote the Democratic ticket. [Applause and laughter.] The gentleman whose name I have mentioned in connection with this high office is one who, when he believes that a thing is right, pursues that line to its termination. [Applause.] He is one who, when he believes a thing is wrong, follows that wrong relentlessly to the end. [Renewed applause and cheers.] A man with courage to abide by his convictions; a man who will stand for what he thinks is right though the heavens fall. Such men have enemies. Andrew Jackson had them; Zachariah Chandler had them; and any man that ever was fit to be out of an insane or idiotic asylum has had them. [Applause.] If nominated, our candidate will be elected; and if elected, he will bring to that high office the most practical common sense of a life of over 40 years spent in active business, during which time he has built up a great establishment and been uniformly and everywhere successful. A man who has twice represented the State of Michigan in national conventions. Not only this, but the State central committee of the Republican party of Michigan, knowing him as they have, and knowing how necessary it is to have an active business man to conduct the details of the campaign, have twice placed Mr. Beal in the position of chairman of the executive committee. * * * * *

This is the man that we present to you; a man who stands four square to every wind that blows; a man who believes in his own ability and is not afraid to express his convictions: a man who will "do justly and fear not." [Great applause.]

Mr. Parker, of Monroe, seconded the nomination of Mr. Beal in the following language:

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention.—In accordance with the wishes of the delegates from Monroe county, and in accordance with the sentiments of the Republicans of that county. I support the nomination of Rice A. Beal. [Applause.] I have listened with pleasure, Mr. Chairman, to the eulogies pronounced upon the different candidates of our State. We have heard from the West, from the East, and from the North; and as Capt. Allen well says, we now bring one who is bright and gallant and pure from the center. Like a diamond, the brightest one is always in the center of the collection. [Applause.] We have heard 25 years ago referred to, here in the city of Jackson, the Republican party was born for a purpose. One part of this country, or one limb of this country was demanding that the body should be delivered over to it, but the Republican party and its gallant leaders,—among the greatest of whom was Zachariah Chandler [applause], said No. To-day this same section of the country demands that we deliver up the body again to them. After trying to secure it by the bayonet they now say they will secure it by the ballot. We need then to represent us here as our chief executive a stalwart, a man of the Chandler type, a man of integrity, a man of forcible and decided character; a man who will take these resolutions that we have heard read—and with no uncertain sound—and carry them like a blazing shield, prone into the ranks of the enemy and secure success for the Republican party. [Applause.] We believe, sir, that such a man is Rice A. Beal, of Washtenaw county. We believe that he is eminently fitted to join that long list of illustrious Governors whose names are spread upon the pages of the history of our great State. We believe, sir, that with him in the executive chair the institutions of our State will be tenderly cared for. We believe, that the interests of the people in all parts of the State will be equally and alike looked after. We believe, sir, with him as our standard bearer, that our friend from Saginaw who presented Mr. Jerome's name will find all the assistance that he desires to carry the eighth district. [Applause and laughter.] We believe that our friend from Detroit will find the influence of Mr. Beal as effective as any other man's could possibly be; and so we say with confidence, Mr. President, that this convention should, and we hope will, place as the standard bearer of the grand old Republican party of Michigan, Rice A. Beal, of Washtenaw county. [Great applause.]

On the first ballot Mr. Beal received 107 to Mr. Rich's 115, being the next highest on the list. Though not nominated, Mr. Beal's name was enthusiastically received, and had it been earlier presented to the people, he would doubtless have secured the prize.

The winter of 1880-1 will long be remembered by the politicians of the country. This was the winter succeeding the Presidential campaign of 1880, in which Gen. Garfield was elected President. The Republican party had succeeded in electing a majority of the National House of Representatives, and the Senate was in doubt. Elections for United States Senator were to be held in several of the States in the Union, and the party in power in the several States were much divided as to choice of persons upon whom to bestow the honor of representing the State as Senator. In Michigan ex-Gov. Bagley, ex-Gov. Baldwin, and Hon. O. D. Conger, were each presented by their respective friends, for the office. Messrs. Bagley and Baldwin were in the lead, with Mr. Conger as third in the race. Mr. Beal, while saying nothing against the merits of the others, was a staunch advocate of Mr. Conger, and in the Courier presented the claims of his favorite in strong terms and convincing arguments. When the Legislature assembled at Lansing, Mr. Beal was present, and although not a member of that body, he was chosen to lead the Conger forces. He went immediately to work, and, as usual, success attended his efforts, Mr. Conger being selected by the caucus, on the seventh ballot, and in the joint meeting of the Legislative body, received the vote of every Republican member. Mr. Beal's efforts in behalf of his friend, Mr.

Conger, and its successful outcome, has brought him more than ever before the people, and has made him virtually the leader of the Republican forces in this State. Higher honors yet await him.

In 1853 Mr. Beal was married to Miss Beers. For more than a quarter of a century they have traveled life's journey together, sharing with each other all the joys and sorrows, and reaping the blessings of a life well spent.

As editor of the Courier Mr. Beal pursues a straightforward course, advocating the right and condemning the wrong, without regard to who may suffer from the publication of the truth. He is an independent and fearless writer, and courts the favor of no man. Always doing a legitimate business, as already remarked, he has been uniformly successful in all his undertakings, and in nearly a half century of active business life he has never knowingly wronged any man and always paid 100 cents on the dollar. Such, in brief, is Rice A. Beal, editor of the Courier.

ANN ARBOR REGISTER.

In 1872 a stock company was formed under the name and style of Ann Arbor Printing and Publishing Company, for the purpose of engaging in newspaper, book publishing and job printing. The officers and stockholders, as first organized, were Alvin W. Chase, President and Superintendent; James C. Watson, Vice-President; Zina P. King, Secretary; Henry S. Dean, Treasurer; Sedgwick Dean and Henry Krause. In December, 1872, the first number of the Register made its appearance. It was an eight-column folio, and published at $1.50 per year. Zina P. King was managing and local editor; Edwin Lawrence, political editor. The paper was Republican in politics.

Among the publications from the press of the Publishing Company, was "Dr. Chase's Second Receipt Book." On the appearance of this work, Rice A. Beal appealed to the court for an injunction against the company, as it was contrary to his agreement with Dr. Chase, who, when he disposed of his interest in the Courier, and the publishing business of that office, agreed not to engage in the same line again in the State of Michigan so long as Mr. Beal continued in the business. The injunction was granted, covering not only the publication of "Dr. Chase's Second Receipt Book," but also the entire printing business. Soon after this the remaining stockholders purchased the interest of Dr. Chase, and asked the Supreme Court to set aside the injunction. Nearly a year and a half expired before the case was heard in the Supreme Court. After a hearing by that body, the injunction was set aside, and the publication of the paper resumed.

When Dr. Chase disposed of his stock, a new election of officers was held, when James C. Watson was elected President; Henry Krause, Vice-President; Zina P. King, Secretary, Henry S. Dean, Treasurer. Mr. Dean was also chosen Superintendent and managing editor, and continued in this position until August, 1880, when he disposed of his stock and retired from the office.

The Register resumed publication in December, 1875, and has since been successfully conducted. It is a six-column folio, edited with ability, and has had an average circulation of 2,900 copies. The office employs on an average, 16 men.

In August, 1880, when Mr. Dean retired from the office, he was succeeded by B. J. Conrad, as Superintendent and Treasurer, and H. P. Myrick as editor. Mr. Conrad had been connected, in a business way, with the office for some years, and was, therefore, well acquainted with the work.

All the modern conveniences and improvements have been introduced into the Register office, and to-day it is one of the best fitted printing establishments in the State. The mechanical execution of the job work done at this office will compare favorably with that turned from any house in Michigan. A large business has been carried on in the book publishing line. Among those issued from the presses of this company are "Watson's Interest, Discount and Investment Tables," by Prof. James C. Watson; "Vaughan's Chemical Physiology and Pathology," by Victor C. Vaughan, M. D., Ph. D. of Michigan University; "French Reading Lessons," by Alfred Hennequin, M. A., of Michigan University.

B. J. Conrad, Superintendent and Treasurer of the Ann Arbor Printing and Publishing Company, was born in Parma, N. Y., March 6, 1833. When two years of age he went with his parents to Albion, Calhoun county, Mich., where he remained until 1852, when he went to California, remaining in that State until 1861, and making in that time a handsome sum of money. On his return to Albion he retired to a farm, which business he followed for some years, until 1868. In 1870 he removed to Ann Arbor and for four years was engaged in the book and stationery trade. In 1874 he went to China in the employ of the Government, in company with Prof. Watson and others, to witness the transit of Venus. Returning home in the fall of 1875, he entered the office of the Register, where he has since been engaged. Mr. Conrad was married in 1864 to Miss Helen M. Foster, of Hillsdale, Mich., and again returned to California, and remained one year. They have had two children, a son and daughter. Mr. Conrad is a good business manager, and the Ann Arbor Printing and Publishing Company will not suffer under his management.

H. P. Myrick, editor of the Register, was born in Pontiac, Oakland Co., Mich., Aug. 27, 1857. He obtained his elementary education in the common schools of his native town, and in 1874, when but 17 years of age, entered Michigan University, from which institution he graduated in the spring of 1878. In the fall of that year he entered the Law Department, but only attended one course of lectures. In 1877, while in his senior year, he became local editor of the Register, continuing in that position until the resignation of Mr. Dean, when he was elected managing editor, which position he now occupies. He is an easy, graceful writer, with a bright future before him.

COLLEGE PAPERS.

The first paper published by the students of Michigan University was a small quarto, the publication of which was begun in 1865, under the name of University Chronicle. The Chronicle was a neat paper, well filled with college news, and was published every alternate Saturday during the college year. It suspended publication at the close of the college year in 1869.

In June, 1867, appeared the first number of the University Magazine, a 32-page octavo magazine, filled with original matter and choice selections. The magazine had an existence of three years, when its publication was suspended.

The Chronicle was the successor of the University Chronicle, and like its predecessor, was edited by students in the University. It has had a continuous existence of 12 years, and is published weekly. It is a 16-page quarto, handsomely printed, and reflects great credit on the students and the institution they represent.

The University made its first appearance December, 1879. It is the same size as the Chronicle, and is a very handsome sheet. Michigan University is well represented by its papers.

ANN ARBOR DEMOCRAT.

The Democrat was established in Ann Arbor in 1878, its first issue bearing date September 12. John L. Burleigh, a writer of some merit, was its editor and proprietor. It was a large eight-column folio, and a firm and uncompromising advocate of Democratic principles. Mr. Burleigh continued its publication until January, 1879, when the Saline Standard was merged into it and a co-partnership effected between John L. Burleigh, B. Frank Bower and Louis Leisemer, under the firm name of Burleigh, Bower & Leisemer. This arrangement continued until Nov. 20, 1879, when the interest of Mr. Leisemer was purchased and the paper continued by Burleigh & Bower, the latter gentleman being Henry E. H. Bower, who purchased the interest of his brother, B. Frank Bower. The various changes did not affect the political character of the paper, it being true to the principles it professed when founded by Mr. Burleigh. Under the special editorial control of Henry E. H. Bower, it has taken front rank among the Democratic papers of the State, Mr. Bower being an easy and fluent writer and firm and positive in his convictions of right.

Henry E. H. Bower was born in Manchester, Washtenaw Co., Michigan, April 20, 1845, and is a son of the late Henry and Margaret G. Bower, the former a native of Pennsylvania, and one of the pioneers of Washtenaw county. Mrs. Bower, whose maiden name was Chase, is a native of New York. Mr. and Mrs. Bower, with their family, removed to Ann Arbor when Henry was yet an infant, and there spent almost his entire life. His education was obtained in the common and high schools of Ann Arbor. Entering the law department of Michigan University, after taking the usual course, he graduated in 1866. After his graduation he engaged for a short time in the mercantile business in Ann Arbor, and then purchased the Ann Arbor Democrat, which he published until February, 1870, when he disposed of the paper and then went to Grand Rapids, where he again embarked in the mercantile trade, continuing in the same about two years. Returning to Ann Arbor, for some years he was employed as correspondent of several of the leading daily papers in the country, among others, the Chicago Times, Cincinnati Commercial, Detroit Post and Tribune. He still continues the same relation with the two former papers. In 1877 he was elected Alderman of the third ward, Ann Arbor, and served for two years in an acceptable manner. In July, 1879, he purchased his brother's interest in the Democrat, and has continued as one of its editors and proprietors to the present time. Mr. Bower is yet a young man with a bright future before him. He is energetic and takes a special interest in all matters tending to build up the interest of his place. He is a member of the Ancient Order of United Workmen.

Col. J. L. Burleigh, lawyer, and editor of the Democrat, was born in Mass. Oct. 15, 1842. His ancestors were among the early settlers of New England. He was educated partly in Berkshire county, Mass., and partly in New York city. At an early age he entered a mercantile house as a clerk, remaining until the opening of the civil war in 1861. At that time he joined the 17th New York Regiment, being the first to sign its muster roll. Soon after, he was appointed Second Lieutenant; and, within a year, he was promoted successfully to the rank of First Lieutenant and Captain,—the last for bravery on the field at Hanover Court-House, May 27, 1862. In 1863 he was made Lieutenant-Colonel of the Seymour Light Infantry; but, owing to his wounds, he left the service and engaged in business in the East Indies. Leaving the Indies on account of ill health, Colonel Burleigh returned to New York, and engaged in business there until 1874. He then removed to Ann Arbor. Having acquired a competency, he desired to enter public life; and, to further this end, graduated from the law department of the University of Michigan. "Politics needs missionaries more than the heathen" is one of his sayings. In the spring of 1876 he was nominated for Mayor of the city of Ann Arbor on the Democratic ticket, but declined to run. In the fall of the same year he was placed on the ticket as the nominee for State Senator, and was elected by a large majority. He was an active member of the Senate of the Legislative session of 1877, and served creditably as a member of the committees on Judiciary and Military Affairs, Claims and Public Accounts, Asylum for the Insane, Expiring Laws, and Engrossment and Enrollment of Bills. Colonel Burleigh has traveled extensively in England, Ireland, France, Italy, Egypt and the East. In April, 1880, he removed to Chicago, where he is now engaged in business.

THE WASHTENAW POST.

This is the first German paper ever started in Washtenaw county. Its publication was begun Oct. 3, 1879. L. J. Leisemer, the founder of the Saline Standard, and for about one year, one of the proprietors of the Ann Arbor Democrat, is the editor and proprietor. The paper began as a six-column quarto, and continued as such for 12 weeks, when, its advertising patronage becoming so large, a change was demanded in its size. It was therefore enlarged to a nine-column folio, with length of columns usually of a 10-column folio, being one of the largest German papers in the country. The large and intelligent German population of this county demand a paper in their native language that will take rank with the best papers published in the English language. This they undoubtedly have in the Post, and few country papers have ever attained the success of the Post in so short a time.

Mr. Leisemer, the editor of the Post, was born in Lisbon, Canada, Aug. 10, 1859. In 1870 he removed with his parents to the village of Saline, in this county, where, in 1872, he entered the office of the Saline Review for the purpose of learning the printing business. This was an important step in his life, and the wisdom of his choice of professions has been proven by the success attending him in the role of editor and publisher. At the age of 18 his career as a publisher began with the Saline Standard. His latest move was in the establishment of the Washtenaw Post, the success of which has already been stated. Mr. Leisemer was married July 2, 1879, to Miss Emma M. Helber, daughter of Dr. C. Helber, of Saline. Mrs. L. is an accomplished lady, a graduate of the department of modern languages, in the class of 1878, of the State Normal School, of Ypsilanti. She is a writer of more than ordinary ability, and since the establishment of the Post, has occupied the position of assistant editor, and has had almost entire control of the local and miscellaneous departments of the paper. To her efforts is due in part the success that has attended its publication. Mr. Leisemer enjoyed no advantages of education other than that of the common schools, save that of the "Poor Man's College,"—the printing office,—a college that has graduated some of the most eminent men of the country, among whom were Benjamin Franklin and Horace Greeley. In politics Mr. Leisemer is a Democrat, but the Post is independent in politics.

Main and Huron streets. The proprietors of the News, Messrs. Ronscup & Tanner, were formerly of Toledo, but during the autumn of 1880 came to Ann Arbor, and on Nov. 23 the first issue of the paper was put into the hands of the citizens of that beautiful city. The paper is a five-column folio, strictly non-partisan and entirely devoted to the local news of Ann Arbor and vicinity. The paper was printed with rented material up to Feb. 1, 1880, but since that time with their own press and material.

The typographical appearance of the News, which is the only daily printed in Washtenaw county, is neat and tasty. It is an honor to any office to send out such an excellent quality of work. The News office is furnished all through with the best material and presses, and for mechanical execution the job work done at this office will compare favorably with that turned out from the larger establishments of the State. Its editors are of the most thoroughly enterprising newspaper men of the county, and that the progress they have made is appreciated by the citizens of the place is evinced by the unusual success attending their enterprise. A short notice of the editors would perhaps be of interest to the many readers of this volume:

Henry W. Ronscup was born at Somerset, Perry Co., Ohio, in 1849, and is a son of John R. and Lucretia Ronscup. Henry was educated at the district schools, but in early life sought employment in a printing office, and has mainly followed that profession through life. He first worked on the Wyandotte Pioneer, of Upper Sandusky, Ohio, in 1868. After six months he became a compositor on the Union of the same city. He next went to Fort Wayne, Ind., and labored on the Daily Democrat, afterward the Daily Sentinel. In 1872, on account of poor health, he resigned his position, and secured employment on the Pittsburg & Fort Wayne R. R., where he worked as brakeman and subsequently as conductor on the G. R. & I. R. R. for four years. In 1876, he again entered the profession, this time in the Gazette office, of Fort Wayne. Not long after he accepted a position as traveling salesman for a wholesale paper establishment of Fort Wayne, and in 1879, entered the office of the Toledo Commercial and Blade. On the 15th of November, 1880, he came to Ann Arbor, and has since labored faithfully and earnestly on the Daily News. On June 18, 1879, he was married to Miss May Graham, the daughter of James Graham, the oldest engineer on the P., F. W. & C. R. R. They have one child, James G.

Gustave A. Tanner was born at Toledo, Ohio, March 29, 1860, and is a son of Jacob Tanner, an old resident of that city. Gustavus early turned his attention to the printing business, and was first employed by Bardull Bros. He subsequently worked on the Toledo Bee, and for six months was a typo in the office of the Cincinnati Enquirer. Previous to his removal to Ann Arbor, he was foreman of the Toledo Telegram. Mr. Tanner is considered one of the best job printers in this section of the country, and that part of the News office is under his able and efficient supervision.

YPSILANTI PAPERS.

THE SENTINEL.

The first paper published in Ypsilanti was the Ypsilanti Republican, by a young man named Wallace. It was published for little over a year, about the year 1837-'38, when, owing to disagreement between the stockholders and printer, it was suspended, the material scattered and the paper was never resumed. In 1844, I. M. Edmunds, John Van Fossen, Arden H. Ballard, and M. Towne, with perhaps others, procured the office of a defunct paper in the interior, and under the lead of John Van Fossen, started the Ypsilanti Sentinel, in the interest of Henry Clay, the Whig candidate for the presidency. It ran until the disastrous Whig defeat of that year, when the "supplies" being cut off it stopped. The owners, desirous of having a paper published in the place, did, through I. M. Edmunds, offer the use of the office to Mr. Charles Woodruff, on condition that he would resuscitate the concern. This he did, and continued the paper for three years; when, finding the proprietors unaccommodating in the matter of refitting the office, he abandoned it in 1848. The material passed into the hands of Aaron Guest, of New York, who published a paper called the Ypsilanti Chronicle, for the period of one year; but he, failing to pay for the office, lost possession of it, when it was purchased by Mr. Woodruff, who revived the Sentinel. This journal has been published without interruption ever since. It is now in its 34th volume, being one of the oldest papers in the State, and perhaps the oldest under an unchanged proprietorship. The People's Advocate and Political Register is the name of another paper started. This continued for a short time, but dropped for lack of encouragement. The Michigan School Journal was also an enterprise that originated in the Sentinel office, and promised fairly; but the time for success had not arrived. The Sentinel leaves little unnoticed. It is a newspaper at once comprehensive and deserving the name it bears. The editor possesses a peculiar idea of free institutions, an idea truly American, and as broad as the Republic which fostered it. Ever opposing an unjust cause, ever upholding what should be the birthright of the human family, he acts the part of a writer whose sympathies are strong and perfect, whose knowledge of the political condition of the nations is full and accurate.

Charles Woodruff, well known throughout the State as one of the earliest supporters of the cause of education in this State, as well as one of its veteran journalists, was born in Seneca county, N. Y. He came to the Territory of Michigan early in 1836. Believing, in view of the liberal grants of land for school and University purposes, that Michigan was to be pre-eminent in educational matters, and afford a good field for teachers, he repaired to the State of Pennsylvania, and, entering Allegheny College, remained until graduating in 1841. In 1842 he returned to the State of Michigan, and began the profession of teaching by establishing a private school, both for English and Classical students. This school, at its close, occupied a building where the seminary now stands, which was subsequently bought and furnished as a central school-house, as the choice of the surrounding districts. Relinquishing the business of teaching on the revival of the public schools, Mr. Woodruff has since devoted himself to an editorial career. The veteran journalist has long since passed the summer of this life, and yet continues to wield the pen with as much ease and vigor as he did long years ago. Throughout the political wars of almost half a century the influence of his journal has been felt and approved by that party in which he places some of his political trust.

The Herald.—The newspaper known as the Ypsilanti Herald was established in 1858 by Messrs. Norris & Follett. This journal opposed the tenets of the Sentinel until July, 1860, when the original owners disposed of the office to James McCracken. Capt. Wilsie purchased McCracken's interest immediately after, and continued the publication of the Herald until April, 1861, when he rented the office to the editor of the Sentinel, who carried on its business in connection with his own.

THE COMMERCIAL.

The Commercial was founded March 1, 1864, with a capital of $600. This journal at that time was a 24x36 sheet; enlarged in 1868 to a 28x40; in 1876 to a 30x44, and in December, 1880, to a 35x47. It is thoroughly Republican in politics. In the various political campaigns it has taken a leading part. It was the first journal in the State to denounce Andrew Johnson as a traitor; the first to sound abroad the treachery in selling out the Republican party of the South for a mere mess of pottage by Mr. Hayes. It was among the first to protest against the re-nomination of Gen. Grant for the presidency, and a strong supporter of Mr. Blaine.

The Commercial has been marked by several exciting local contests of a business and social character. The first was that attendant on the support given to the D., H. & S. W. railroad. In this connection no less than 172 able editorials were written, showing that its construction would ultimately lead to the construction of the Toledo & Air Line road via Ypsilanti.

The temperance movement of November, 1872, in this section of Washtenaw, owes its origin and success to the Commercial.

Another war, carried on through its columns, was that against the card-players of the Reform Club. The cards were excluded, and the society became a reformed club.

During the University war this journal joined issue with the anti-Beal-ers, and formed one of their strongest supporters.

The Commercial building is at present an office 22x60 feet, two stories high, replete in all its departments, and unquestionably a leading printing office. The circulation of this journal compares favorably with the county journals, and claims the largest circulation in the county of Washtenaw. The editor appears to have been raised in the school of literature. A genial temperament, benevolent disposition, and honesty of purpose mark his progress through this world. He entered the journalistic work while still a student, and when circumstances called him into a more practical branch of journalism, as editor and publisher of the Commercial, he carried with him a college enthusiasm and a literary man's tastes. Mr. Pattison's character as an able journalist has been well sustained. Under his care the Commercial has won for itself a high name, and a career of increasing prosperity.

C. R. Pattison was born May 7, 1824, at Forrestville, Chautauqua Co., N. Y. At the age of 12 years he came to Michigan Territory with his parents, Dr. S. W. and Mrs. Phœbe Pattison. From 1836 to 1840 he devoted his time to fishing and hunting and clerking in a store. During these years he received a liberal education at his father's home, so that at the age of 17 he taught a district school. Subsequently he was appointed Principal of the High School at Trenton a few terms, and was an assistant in the Ypsilanti Academy. For one year he was a pupil in the preparatory department of the Madison University, N. Y. In the fall of 1846 he entered the Michigan University. His class comprised 16 members, including Edwin Hewitt and W. C. Stevens, now of this city, Dr. Root and Dr. Hindy. Not one of these was enrolled on the sophomore list. Among the graduates were General Barber, O. M. Barnes, Calvin Bacon, Rev. Wm. Cathcart, Rev. L. R. Fisk, Hon. J. W. McMath, Wm. A. Moore; contending with poverty as concomitance incidental to most students of that day, in June, 1850, they spoke their little pieces in the Baptist church. Prof. A. Ten Brook was President. The title of Mr. Pattison's oration was "The Hope of Europe." Bouquets were not then in fashion on such occasions, or otherwise the orator would have received a shower. Rushing, tearing up sidewalks, and other peccadilloes of hair-brained scapegoats were not then in vogue; the freshmen, however, were initiated by a harmless, amusing performance called bump-tonism, requiring prowess on the part of the sophomores, and a gallant resistance on that of the verdant freshmen. In the tussle Root and Hendee came off first best, and of the remainder of the class Mr. Pattison saith not.

The secret society contest occurred in 1849; the faculty attempted to root out secret societies. In the conflict which ensued he was a mere spectator, as previous to his entrance into college he formed an inveterate prejudice against such societies. His mother thought them to be of a most noxious character, and to her he made a solemn promise that he would not join one during his collegiate course. So far as this promise is concerned he has not since changed his mind. Through the last 15 years he has connected himself with the Masons, Good Templars, Sons of Temperance and Knights of Honor. The first inculcates some ennobling sentiments, but still possesses serious drawbacks. Were he to pass through college again he would glory in being a "neutral," though he owns it requires pluck and nerve and a big fight to secure deserved recognition. It is his judgment that they are yet destined to drain to the very dregs the virility and true independence of college life, and tend to that accursed monopoly in college halls that is undermining the institutions and independence of our country in railroading, telegraphing, etc. He was a member of the glorious Alpha Nu, a literary society embracing a large membership and more talent than any others in college. In debate, orations, etc., he always took a full part. The weekly sessions were to him a source of pleasure, and the editorship of the Sibyl for three terms, a literary journal, aided largely in preparing him for a journalistic career. With the assistance of others, Mr. Pattison raised the standard of the Sibyl to such a high position that it was a power. One of its leading features was a review of the orators of the Alpha Nu.

Professor Ten Brook held the chair of mental and moral philosophy; Dr. Wheedon, general literature and history; Prof. Agnew, ancient languages; Prof. Fasquelle, modern languages; Dr. Douglass, chemistry and geology, and Prof. Williams, the chair of mathematics.

After graduating at Ann Arbor, Mr. Pattison went to Newton Theological Seminary, Mass., from which he graduated in June, 1853. In the fall of that year he was appointed pastor of the First Baptist Church, of Pontiac, where he remained until Oct. 1, 1855. In Pontiac the church was built up and received quite an addition. In January, 1856, he was chosen pastor of the Baptist Church at Grass Lake, Jackson Co., where he baptized over 30 persons. Ill health forced him to retire from pastoral work, and he became agent of the Baptist Publication Society, Jan. 1, 1857, for Michigan; also during this term he was correspondent of the Michigan Christian Herald, editing the famous "Notes by the Way."

Mr. Pattison married Miss Ellen Frey Sept. 3, 1854. This lady is a daughter of Deacon Job Frey, of Athol, Mass. They are the parents of nine children, of whom one (Willie) died in infancy. The eldest daughter, an accomplished young lady, died in 1877, at the age of 21 years. The eldest son, Warren F., now local editor of the Commercial, was a member some years of the State Normal School, and also of the Agricultural College. Lizzie, eldest living daughter, graduated last year, with honor at the Normal School, and is now a preceptress at Cairo.

Ypsilanti True Democrat.—C. R. Pattison purchased the office of the Herald Jan. 1, 1864, and issued the first number of the True Democrat March 3, 1864. The editor subsequently changed the title of his newspaper to that of the Commercial.

is independent in politics. From its inauguration signal success has waited upon it; its typography and entire mechanical work are perfect; its columns, always replete with news, show that a rare attention is bestowed by the editor. The steady progress which has marked its career is evidence of the popularity of the journal; from an issue of 600 copies early in 1880, it is said to have advanced so rapidly, that now an actual circulation of over 1,100 copies is enjoyed. Mr. Woodruff is an estimable young man; he has given to his journal that name which really pertains to himself. His sympathies are peculiarly Ypsilantian, and being so, there is every prospect of his reaching the summit of success,—success.

M. F. Woodruff, second son of Charles Woodruff, was born at Ypsilanti Aug. 13, 1853. Educated at the Union School, he graduated there in the class of 1870. Entering the office of the Sentinel, he became foreman, which position he held until Oct. 1, 1874, when he accepted a partnership in the Sentinel. His marriage with Miss Eva Bowlby, of Ovid, Mich., was celebrated Nov. 7, 1878. He was connected with his father's journal until Oct. 1, 1879, when he left that office and became the founder of the Ypsilantian. The office was furnished in December, 1879, and the first copy of his journal issued Jan. 2, 1880.

The School.—This monthly journal or magazine was edited by C. F. R. Bellows, A. M., and published by Bellows & Co. The School was the organ of the Normal Schopl. devoted to educational interests, contributed to by leading educators, and supported principally by the faculty of the Normal. The journal was printed in the office of the Commercial.

DEXTER PAPER.

DEXTER LEADER.

In 1868 Norman E. Allen, of Dexter, began the issue of an advertising sheet, under the name of the Dexter Bulletin, publishing it semi-occasionally. After the issue of five or six numbers, the village began to see the importance of having a newspaper to represent its interests. A printer from Detroit was induced to locate there, and with capital furnished by S. C. Alley, an office was purchased, and on the 28th day of January, 1869, the first number of the Dexter Leader made its appearance, with the names of Alley & Wickmere, as publishers. It was a seven-column folio, and a very neat and tidy little sheet. The co-partnership existing between Mr. Alley and Mr. Wickmere was dissolved May 13, 1869, when Mr. Alley continued the publication of the paper for a few months longer, disposing of it in September to Archibald McMillan, who immediately assumed control. Mr. McMillan was a good printer and a writer of more than ordinary ability, one who had experienced a somewhat checkered career. He served through the war, and at its close went to Detroit and embarked in business, which, not proving successful, compelled him again to return to his trade of printer. The Leader, under his control, was made an excellent country paper, and yielded a comfortable income. Desiring a larger field of operation, he disposed of his paper in September, 1876, and removed to Bay City. Mr. McMillan's successor was Orville E. Hoyt, who went to Dexter from Ypsilanti. Mr. Hoyt was a good printer and made the Leader a handsome paper. In May, 1880, David Edgar purchased the office and good will of the paper, which has flourished under his management. David Edgar was born in the county of Down, Ireland, Sept. 30, 1831. In 1844, with his parents, he emigrated to America and settled at Lansingburg, N. Y., where he remained until 1857. At Lansingburg he attended an academy, and went through the preparatory course, entering Princeton College in 1851, from which he graduated in 1854, with the degree of A. B. In 1855 he entered Princeton Theological Seminary, graduating from that institution in 1857, at which time he received his degree of A. M. On graduating he received a call to minister to the Presbyterian Church at Haverstraw, Rockland Co., New York, where he remained one year. He has since served as pastor or supply for the Churches in Duanesburg, New York, two years; Troy, New York, seven years; Napoleon, Ohio, four years; Upper Sandusky, Ohio, two years; Parma, Michigan, three years; Raisin, Michigan, four years. It will thus be seen Mr. Edgar has had an active ministerial career for twenty-three years.

Dec. 16, 1857, he was united in marriage with Miss Matilda Dummer, at Waterford, New York. One child, a son, is the result of this union. In order to educate this son, and to enable the family to be near each other, Mr. Edgar moved to Dexter and purchased the Leader. Mr. Edgar's excellent education, his long ministerial career, and native genius, enable him to conduct the Leader in a far better manner than falls to the lot of most provincial papers.

CHELSEA PAPER.

CHELSEA HERALD.

This paper is the successor of the Grass Lake Reporter, the office in which it is published having been removed by its proprietor from the village of Grass Lake, Jackson Co., in 1871: Like all country papers not having a large amount of official patronage, it has had its seasons of prosperity and seasons of adversity. As a general thing, it has enjoyed a fair amount of patronage; its advertisers are liberal, the result of having live merchants in the village. Andrew Allison, its editor and proprietor, was born in the city of Glasgow, Scotland, Nov. 16, 1827. He is the son of Andrew and Jane (Nelson) Allison. His father was a tallow chandler. When he was 10 years of age his parents came to America and located at Toronto, Can., and there, at 14, he began to work as a printer in the Colonist office. He was bound for five years as an apprentice, and after he had finished this term of service he, in 1841, went to Buffalo, N. Y., and worked in Faxon's job office. He was there two years, at the end of which he went back to Toronto and was there married to Miss Forrester Bentley, in 1850. They soon went to Oswego, and Mr. Allison there worked a week in the Times office, after which he and his wife went to Rochester, where he found employment in the Democrat office, remaining there for two years. Buffalo was Mr. Allison's next stopping place, and Cleveland the next, where he worked a week on the Plaindealer. In Sandusky he was employed a short time on the Clarion. He finally settled down in Detroit and followed his profession there for 17 years. He was an employe on the Free Press when W. F. Story, of the Chicago Times, owned that paper, and worked in numerous other offices. In 1867 he removed to Grass Lake, Jackson Co., and started the Grass Lake Reporter. After four years' trial at Grass Lake, he concluded that Chelsea was a more promising point for a newspaper venture, and removed his office to this village and started the Chelsea Herald in September, 1871. He has continued the paper ever since, and has succeeded in establishing it on a profitable basis, with a large circulation and a liberal advertising patronage. His office is well equipped with news and job material, and is more complete in this respect than most country offices. Mr. Allison is a member of the Odd Fellows and Masonic fraternities. Besides his printing establishment and newspaper, he possesses considerable town property, and owns the house in which he resides.

MANCHESTER PAPERS.

THE MANCHESTER ENTERPRISE.

This paper was established in October, 1867, by Geo. A. Spafford. This journal was an independent weekly newspaper, and continued to be issued regularly until October, 1868, when Spafford's interest was purchased by Mat D. Blosser. This newspaper is a 28-column journal, well printed, and replete with news. The office, at the time of purchase, was valued at $1,000; now it has reached a valuation of about $3,000. The circulation of the Enterprise in 1868 was 250 copies weekly, increased in October of that year to 350, and now to 900 copies. It circulates through S. W. Washtenaw, Northern Lenawee and S. E. Jackson. The office employs three men, and is furnished with a Washington newspaper press, a Globe job press, with cutters and new type. The job work is done in the latest styles, and equals in neatness the product of metropolitan printing houses. Mr. Spafford started the office on a capital of $5.00. His successor started with a smaller capital and made the enterprise a success.

Mat. D. Blosser was born at Tecumseh, Lenawee Co., Mich., Sept. 3, 1846, son of Peter F. and Sarah E. (Beyler) Blosser, of Lockport, Niagara Co., N. Y. The family came to Michigan in 1844 and settled at Tecumseh, where the editor of the Enterprise was born. Having received a fair education at the Union school, he entered the Tecumseh Herald office in 1860, under W. A. Minocks, where he acquired the art of printing. Going East, he completed his knowledge of the printing business at Lockport, N. Y. There he labored in the job office of the Daily Journal and Courier until 1864, when he returned West. Between the years 1864 and 1867 Mr. Blosser worked at various places, laying up a store of experiences during his travels. He ultimately came to Manchester in 1867, where he aided Spafford in the establishment of the Enterprise, and a year later became its sole proprietor and editor. Since Mr. Blosser's editorial career was entered upon, he has followed the course of an independent journalist, and has succeeded in rendering the Enterprise one of the most trustworthy journals in the county.

In 1812 Matthias Blosser, of Seneca county, N. Y., served in the independent company raised there during that year. The company served for three months in the Lake campaign, at Buffalo, Lewiston and Niagara. At the close of his term of service, he re-enlisted for a second term. The Blosser family arrived from Germany about the middle of the 17th century. It was here while a European aristocracy molded the colonists to follow the paths, and be content in the condition of slaves; and when the new era arrived, when the people of the colonies had attained a high intelligence, the sons of that German immigrant entered the ranks of the Revolution and aided in casting off the foulest tyranny that ever crushed the energies of a people.

The Manchester Journal was established Oct. 21, 1873, by G. R. Palmer, as a weekly newspaper, independent in politics. Though published here, the paper was printed at Jackson or Tecumseh, and reached a circulation of about 300. The publication of the Journal became irregular, and was suspended entirely after a career of 10 or 11 months.

SALINE PAPERS.

Saline Review.—This was the first paper started in the village of Saline. It was established in the fall of 1872, and was an eight-column folio, neutral in politics, and was regarded with great favor for a time by the citizens of Saline and vicinity. David Sherwood was the editor and proprietor, and succeeded in making a good local paper. The business men of the village patronized the paper quite liberally, and it had a very fair subscription list during the first year. Its success was not as great the second year, and at the expiration of six months on the second volume it suspended publication. The office was removed to Plymouth, Mich., by Mr. Sherwood, who embarked in the printing business at that place.

Saline Oracle.—The second attempt in establishing a newspaper in Saline was in the fall of 1875, by W. W. Secord, who began the publication of a five-column quarto, neutral in politics. Mr. Secord was the editor, but was assisted by George Miles. The paper never received any great encouragement either in the way of advertising or subscriptions, and at the end of one year it was discontinued and the office moved to Ypsilanti. Its existence is hardly remembered by the people of Saline.

Saline Standard.—On the 1st day of December, 1877, L. J. Leisemer, who was raised in the village, and worked at the printing trade in the offices of the Review and Oracle, began the publication of the Saline Standard, a seven-column folio. The paper was continued but one year, and in that time was well patronized by the business men in the way of advertisements, and by the people in subscriptions. The paper was a success from the beginning, and was only suspended from the fact that Mr. Leisemer could better himself by a consolidation with the Ann Arbor Democrat, and removing to the latter place. At the time Mr. Leisemer started the Standard he was but 18 years of age, and was the youngest publisher in the State, if not in the Union. His success was, therefore, the more commendable.

SALINE OBSERVER.

The publication of this paper was commenced in November, 1880. It is a large folio sheet, with LeBaron & Co. as publishers, and George J. Nisely, editor. Mr. Nisely has succeeded in making an interesting and readable paper, which is appreciated by the business men, as evinced by the advertising patronage obtained, and by the citizens in sustaining it by their subscriptions. Mr. Nisely was born in Saline, Dec. 5, 1858. His parents are Daniel and Margaret Nisely. He received his education in the schools of Saline and Ann Arbor. In 1877 he engaged in the grocery and crockery trade, with Mr. Le Baron, his partner in the printing business, which business is still continued by the firm. In 1878 Mr. Nisely purchased an amateur outfit and occupied his leisure time in odd jobs of printing, especially for the firm. From this humble beginning originated the present live newspaper, the first issue of which bears date Nov. 18, 1880. Mr. Nisely is yet young, and a bright future lies before him, which he will doubtless improve.

CHAPTER XXI.

MISCELLANEOUS.

TREMENDOUS TORNADO.

On Tuesday evening, July 7, 1874, occurred in Ann Arbor one of the most destructive storms of wind, hail and rain that was ever witnessed in any community. All day long the sun had been excessively hot, and just at sunset two dark clouds were seen to approach from the southwest; others, of a very dark and murky appearance immediately followed, when the storm commenced in all its fury, passing in its destroying march from west to east, uprooting hundreds of good forest trees, in some instances large oaks, two or three feet in diameter, being torn from their roots and given to the four winds; fences were scattered broadcast, in some cases buildings unroofed, and bricks thrown from the chimneys many feet. One man had some 500 peach-trees torn from the earth; others lamented the destruction of large tracts of timber. Many farmers found their stock running at pleasure over the farm in the morning, without hindrance from fence. The roads were made impassable by the fallen trees, and progress through them was exceedingly difficult for two or three days. Altogether it caused much destruction of property.

RAIN STORM.

On Friday, April 8, 1836, Washtenaw county was visited with a destructive rain storm, accompanied with vivid flashes of lightning and heavy peals of thunder. For several days previous it had been quite warm and pleasant. All nature seemed to wear the cheerfulness of spring. The roads had become dry and passable after the frosts of winter, when, unexpectedly, the sky began to darken and the rain to descend in torrents. The storm continued, with slight intermission, for about 12 hours. The effects were such as probably never before had been witnessed in this county. Little rivulets by the wayside were swollen into large streams, tearing up the roads, sweeping away crossways, bridges and fences. The larger streams and rivers arose with corresponding rapidity, continuing and extending the work of destruction on a more magnificent scale. The roads on all sides were rendered almost impassable, while many of the most valuable and important bridges on the main roads were swept away, and machinery on the different streams was more or less damaged.

MIRACULOUS ESCAPE.

On Friday, June 25, 1858, at about 2 o'clock, occurred what was thought at that time to be a most distressing accident, but what proved to be only a slight one. It seems that two men, named James Bush and Horace Richmond, were digging a well on the premises of L. C. Risdon and W. S. Saunders, and had got down some 35 feet, when the curbing gave way, and they were buried beneath 17 feet of earth and rubbish. The alarm was immediately given, and a large number of men with picks and shovels commenced to clear away the dirt, and to rescue the imprisoned victims. Hour after hour was spent in taking out the treacherous gravel, which ran in from the banks almost as fast as taken out, and about 11 A. M., on Saturday, one of the workmen sounded the "depths below" with a crowbar, and sent back the glad response that there was air. About a quarter to 12, a voice came up from the depths. It uttered: "We are both alive. For God's sake take off the dirt and give us some water." A great shout went up from the assembled hundreds, and a great burden was lifted from the hearts of the wives of the two men—one only 14 years old and a bride of only a few weeks. The men labored with renewed energy, and at 4 P. M., after an entombment of 26 hours, Richmond was relieved, and drawn to the top. He was uninjured in limb, and in an hour or two had fully recovered. Bush was not taken out till eight o'clock, having been confined 30 hours. He was somewhat bruised, and his lower limbs perfectly paralyzed, the pressure of gravel having stopped the circulation. He was taken to a residence near by, where he lay in a critical condition for several days, but finally recovered. In talking about it afterward, Richmond said that at the moment of the accident he had unhooked the rope from the bucket, and was coming out of the well, having given the word to hoist. He was consequently standing up, and Bush was stooping over, when the mass fell. The old curbing in the well formed an arch over his head about as high as he could reach, thus protecting him from the rush of gravel, his lower limbs being wedged fast. He assisted Bush, who from his position was comparatively helpless, and drew the gravel away from his face to give breathing room. The first move that was made above ground was heard by the sufferers below. They heard the men removing the stones and rubbish, and heard the voices, but couldn't understand what was said. They talked freely together most all the time, but Richmond slept quite soundly a portion of the time, and was not a little surprised on awakening to find that he had neither turned over in bed nor kicked the clothes off. The preservation of these men was indeed a miracle, and one which will long be remembered by the sufferers and their friends.

BOILER EXPLOSION AT YPSILANTI.

A terrible calamity occurred at Ypsilanti on Friday, Jan. 14, 1876, in Cornwell's Paper Mill, the boiler exploding, killing two men and injuring one other. The hour at which this sad catastrophe happened was precisely noon, and there were only three men in the building at the time—John Max, the engineer, a youth named Charles Otto, and a farmer named John Farmer. These men were in the engine room, and the youth noticed the steam gauge going around quite rapidly, and exclaimed: "There is something wrong here," and was laughed at by the man Farmer, who stood warming himself at the fire. John Max, the engineer, glanced at the gauge and sprang on top of one of the boilers—there being two of them and connected with each other—to open the valve between the boilers, and to let the steam from one into the other. At this moment it is supposed the boiler exploded. The explosion was heard by the people of Ypsilanti, and many thought it was an earthquake; but in a few moments it was known what had occurred and hundreds rushed to the spot. One-half of the large mill was a perfect ruin. The large brick chimney, nearly one hundred feet high, was blown still higher, and came down with a thundering crash. The body of the engineer, John Max, was found at the foot of a hay-stack in a horribly mutilated condition, while a few feet off his head was found lying on a wood-pile. The boy, Otto, was found under the debris in the corner of the engine room, while near him lay John Farmer, who had several ribs broken and was entirely disabled. The end of the boiler, weighing about 4,000 pounds, was blown about 180 feet and plowed a large hole in the ground at that distance. A coronor's jury was impaneled and gave a verdict that the steam gauge was not in safe working order, but the boiler was in good condition. The man Max left a wife and six children to mourn the untimely loss of an ever indulgent husband and father. The loss to the owners of the mill was nearly $10,000.

WASHTENAW COUNTY BIBLE SOCIETY.

This society was organized in 1829 as auxiliary to the American Bible Society, of New York. A large number of Bibles and Testaments, in the English and German languages, have been sold and donated in Washtenaw county since the organization of the society. A large number of destitute persons have been supplied with the Scriptures through its labors. Those making annual donations to the society are members of the same. For many years the county was annually canvassed by an agent appointed by the parent society, but acting in co-operation with the county society. A large amount of money was thus annually raised. Of late years this plan has been abandoned; therefore the receipts have been considerably lessened.

CRIME.

The county of Washtenaw will compare favorably with any county of the same population with respect to the number of crimes committed within its borders. From a careful examination of the court records, extending over a period of 54 years, it is ascertained there have been bills of indictment found against 553 persons, distributed as follows:

MARRIAGE RECORD.

The institution of marriage is a holy one, and ought to be most sacredly protected. The county has had its full share of "marrying and giving in marriage." Following is a list of the marriages as shown by the records up to 1830, after which they became too numerous to detail:

- Rufus Knight and Sally Scott, Feb. 17, 1827, by Martin Davis, J. P.

BIRTHS.

The command to "multiply and replenish the earth," since the days of Noah, has been in process of fulfillment. Until the year 1867, no record was made of the births in this county or State, but since that time it has been obligatory upon physicians and others to report all cases under their observation. From the records in the County Clerk's office, the following table has been compiled, showing the number of births each year, from 1867 to 1879 inclusive, together with the number of cases of twins.

Year.	No. Births.	No. Twins.	Year.	No. Births.	No. Twins.	Year.	No. Births.	No. Twins.

OVER THE RIVER.

Death, the grim monster, is ever at his work. Day by day his calls are made upon the human race, and every moment of time one or more lay down life's burden and pass over to the other side. No stage of life is exempt. The infant upon its mother's knee, the youth and maiden full of life's vigor, those in their prime, old age with palsied limbs and withered features, each are summoned in turn, and all must obey. No appeal can be taken from the stern command of such a monster. Some who are called are ready to go, and calmly await the summons, and with a smile upon their features, step into the dark waters and so are taken "over the river." Others dread the call; life with them is full of brightness. Some have sinned away their day of grace and with a bitter cry say, "The summer is ended, the harvest is past, and my soul is not saved." But the inexorable demands of death must be met, and happy are those who can say with the Apostle Paul, "I have fought the good fight; I have kept the faith, and henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me in that day."

The following table shows the number of deaths from 1867 to 1879, a period of thirteen years:

Year.	No. Deaths.	Year.	No. Deaths.	Year.	No. Deaths.	Year.	No. Deaths.

DIVORCE RECORD.

Notwithstanding the divine injunction, "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder," the courts of the land year by year are called upon to dissolve the marriage tie. Flimsy excuses are invented by husbands and wives who may be tired of one another's company, the courts are appealed to and the command of God disobeyed. While not the province of the historian to comment upon facts, yet there are matters of history that should be laid bare that all may realize that reforms are necessary. There have been since the organization of the county 9,701 couples united in marriage, an average of 180 per year. In the same time there have been 513 cases of divorce, showing one divorce to every eighteen couple married. The following table shows the number of divorces granted each year:

CHOLERA WAR.

“Wars and rumors of wars” have often been rife in old Washtenaw, though but few know there was once a cholera war in the county. The Legislative Council, in 1831–2, passed an act which was approved by acting Gov. Mason, permitting the authorities of each town or village to prohibit emigrants or travelers from entering their territory, and gave authority to call out the militia for that purpose.

When it became known at Ypsilanti that cholera was in Detroit, in 1832, the authorities called out a company of militia, under command of Captain Josiah Burton. The company was stationed at Bowen’s tavern, three miles east of Ypsilanti, on the Chicago turnpike. When the stage came along from Detroit with the mail and passengers, it was stopped and a parley ensued. There being no arrangement made, the driver attempted to run through, and one of his horses was shot down. It was thought he was killed, but on being helped up, the driver put whip to his horses and passed on without another shot. It is probable the militia thought there might be danger in stopping the United States mail. In fact one of the brave men—Lorenzo Davis—who was Deputy Postmaster at Ypsilanti, was reported to the Department for this act. After an investigation the authorities at Washington dismissed the case without decapitating Mr. Davis.

Samuel Pettibone, in writing of this war, said: “At this time I was living east of Bowen’s tavern, on the Chicago road, and the news of the fight with the stage caused many to wish to avoid Ypsilanti, so I often acted as pilot to run them past the village. A few days after the battle, along came the Governor, Stevens T. Mason, on his way to Mottville. He wanted to run the guard and shun Ypsilanti. We went across the north part of the plain, crossed the Huron at the upper bridge, and came into the Chicago road west of the village. It was four miles to the first tavern west, and only half a mile back into the village, and by going around we had not passed a tavern after leaving Sheldon’s. The pressure was too great—he must go back to the village. He was arrested by Eliphallet Turner, who brought him to the sheriff, Dr. Withington, and after a short but stormy discussion, the Governor was allowed to depart, and he instantly started for Mottville. The first official act the Governor was known to do was to take away the Doctor's commission as sheriff, and appoint in his stead William Anderson, of Ann Arbor."

A RETROSPECT.

One hundred years ago the Revolutionary war was in progress. A small colony of fearless men were battling for their rights with one of the most powerful nations of the earth. Thirteen States, extending back from the sea-coast but a short distance, with but three millions in all of men, women and children, white and colored, completing the whole. The Great West was unknown. True, a few adventurous spirits had pushed their way through this uninhabitable waste, and in the name of the King of France, proclaimed it part of that realm; but, in their wildest imagination, it is doubtful if they ever conceived the idea that in less than a century of time it would be inhabited by a thrifty, enterprising race, and be the most productive region of the world.

Three-fourths of a century ago the territory of Michigan was organized, while containing less than four thousand whites, nearly all of whom were of French descent, and the greater part living in the then village of Detroit. Fourteen years after, the Indian title to a portion of the lands was extinguished, and they were first thrown open for settlement. Three years more passed away, when, in 1822, the territory comprising the county of Washtenaw was placed upon the market, and the boundaries of a new county defined. Eleven years previous, three adventurous Frenchmen established a trading post on the site of the present city of Ypsilanti, but soon after abandoned it. In 1823 the first permanent settlement by whites was made, and from this time dated the onward march of Washtenaw county.

Fifty-eight years—from 1823 to 1881—with its joys and sorrows, its trials and disappointments, have passed into history. The old and middle-aged of the first years of the history of this county have passed away. They fought a good fight in reclaiming waste places; they finished their course, and now rest from their labors, while “their works do follow them.” The young of that day are now aged men and women, who have lived to see the wilderness “blossom as the rose,” and now calmly await the summons to “come up higher.”

Fifty-eight years ago the waters of the various rivers and creeks of Washtenaw county were unobstructed as they passed on to the lakes and from thence to the seas. The axe of the woodman was not then heard in its forests; its prairies were unbroken by the plow, and all nature was in its most pleasant mood.

Fifty-eight years ago less than half a dozen families inhabited the county. They were separated from friends, with no convenient means of communication. The railroad, the telegraph, the telephone and the phonograph were unknown. Mail communications were not established, and the nearest postoffice was Detroit, thirty miles away, with only an Indian trail and the Huron river leading in its direction.

Fifty-seven years ago there was not a mill in all Washtenaw county, all supplies of flour and meal being brought by way of the Huron river on flat boats to a point within a few miles of the present city of Ypsilanti. At that time there was not a church or a school-house in the county and the school-master was unknown.

Fifty-six years ago the first school-house was built, and a step taken in educational progress.

Fifty-four years ago the county was duly organized by an act of the Legislative Council, and a proclamation of Gov. Cass. At that time there were less than 3,000 souls within its borders.

Fifty-two years ago the first number of the first paper printed in Washtenaw made its appearance, and the great lever was then introduced which tends to move the world, and which has exerted an influence upon the minds of the citizens of the county which will never be known and can never be realized.

Fifty-one years ago the population of the county had increased to 4,042, which in four years more, or 47 years ago, had been increased to 14,924, and still farther increased in 1840 to 23,571. An increase was reported every decade, being 28,569 in 1850; in 1860 it was 35,757; in 1870 it was 41,434; and in 1880 it was 41,869.

Forty-nine years ago the fears of the inhabitants of the county were aroused and the militia called out to defend their homes and firesides from the dreaded Black Hawk, who was three hundred miles away.

Forty-eight years ago the first house of worship was erected in Washtenaw county, its inhabitants previously worshiping in school-houses and by the firesides of the pioneers.

Forty-seven years ago the first court-house in Washtenaw county was erected, and every citizen was proud of the fact that Justice would have a permanent abode worthy of the fame and good name of Washtenaw.

Forty-six years ago "war's dread alarm" was sounded, and the brave men of Washtenaw hastened to drive back the ruthless invader who was trying to rob Michigan of some of its fair territory. The Toledo war has its place in history.

Forty-five years ago the excitement ran high in Washtenaw with reference to the rights of a State to retain its territory against the dictation of the General Government.

Forty-three years ago the first railroad was built through the county, and it was then placed in close connection, by means of the iron horse, with the rest of the world.

Twenty years ago the news was flashed over the wires that the rebels had made an attack upon and compelled the surrender of Fort Sumter. Immediately a call was issued by the President for 75,000 men, and supplemented in a few days afterwards for 300,000 more. The brave sons of Washtenaw, ever ready to respond to their country's call, rushed to the front, and upon the fierce battle-fields of the South many of them poured out their life's blood.

Washtenaw county in the past has always taken an advanced position. Never has it taken a backward step. Whether in the cause of religion, temperance, or education, it has always stood in the front. In educational progress, no county can compare with it. Its University, its Normal, its graded and its public schools, are all of the best. As it has been in the past, so, doubtless, it will be in the future.

WASHTENAW COUNTY OF TO-DAY.

As it is impossible for the pen of the historian to do justice to the past, even so will he fail to properly present the Washtenaw of to-day. No county in the State can show a better record. In its churches, its schools, its manufacturing interests, its public and private buildings, in fact everything that goes to show a progressive people, it has taken a leading position. It has to-day two incorporated cities, four incorporated villages, and four unincorporated villages. It has a population of 42,000 thrifty and enterprising people. The great power of the Huron and tributary streams have been utilized, and scores of manufacturing institutions flourish upon their banks.

In the early day citizens of Washtenaw county met for worship in school-houses, barns, or private dwelling houses, anywhere they were permitted, and glad were they of the opportunity; to-day churches are upon every hand, from the plain, unpretending frame, where a few zealous men and women gather together "in the name of Jesus," to the imposing brick or stone, with bells pealing forth a joyful welcome to one and all to come and "drink of the waters of life."

The old log school-house has long since been displaced, and to-day are found, especially in the larger villages and cities, school buildings of handsome architectural appearance, costing many thousands of dollars each, and equipped with every appliance that can promote the cause of education. The comfort of pupils has been secured by the introduction of suitable seats and desks. Maps, globes, philosophical apparatus, music, libraries, commodious playgrounds, well ventilated apartments, beautiful plants and flowers, are all used as accessories, and the result is a humanizing influence. A large revenue derived from taxation is annually raised sufficient to maintain a scholarly corps of teachers. In addition to the public schools there are in the county two institutions of learning that have a world-wide fame, the University of Michigan, located at Ann Arbor, and the State Normal School, at Ypsilanti. Under the most patient, persistent efforts they have been made what they are, a credit to the county and State, and to the general cause of education.

Washtenaw county boasts of another civilizing influence in her newspapers, 14 weekly and one daily; all of which are well and ably edited.

In manufactures, though not so large as some others, yet a very respectable showing is made. The paper-mills and flouring-mills do a large and flourishing business.

In agriculture and horticulture, Washtenaw county stands in the front of all the counties in Michigan. Little vacant land is to be found in any part of the county; many acres, which a few years ago were thought to be worthless on account of swamps, are to-day the most productive farms in the State.

TOWNSHIP HISTORIES.

SALEM TOWNSHIP.

The history of Salem is happily without any of those terribly sensational characteristics which at the period of their occurrence startle a community, and the history of which would now cause a blush of shame to mantle the face of a citizen of the township wherein such deeds were committed. Salem does not offer one such event to history. Its record is one of pure and simple progress, unmarked by crime or whisky. In the compilation of this historical sketch the members of the township pioneer committee have given a singularly able co-operation,—a co-operation expected only from men who take a pride in carrying out promises whether made or implied. The biographical section of this history, though beyond the control of the committee or of the writer of this sketch, has been well prepared, and in its compilation the men of the township made light the labors of the biographer.

EARLY SETTLEMENT OF SALEM.

The first American settlers of Salem were John Dickenson, Joseph Dickenson and Mrs. Amy Dickenson, all natives of New York, who left Seneca county in 1825, and located lands on sections 13 and 14, in the fall of that year. About the same period Elkanah Pratt, better known as Dr. Pratt, met John Dickenson in the forest and claimed him as a neighbor, so that for a long period the question, Who is the first bona-fide settler? was discussed. Now, however, it is conceded that the honor belongs to the Dickensons, as they preceded Dr. Pratt by a few days. In 1827 Dickenson built the first log barn ever erected in the township, and three years later (1830) constructed the first frame barn. Edmund Pratt, son of the Doctor, came in 1826, and erected the first log dwelling-house. Jesse Peters and Mrs. Peters arrived in the township with Mr. Pratt. Royal Wheelock came as early as the year 1825; Aaron Blood in October, 1825; he settled in Salem in 1826; Joseph Lapham, in 1828; Jacob Bullock, in April, 1827; Constant Woodworth, in 1826; Daniel S. Burch, in 1827; P. C. Murray, in 1828; Luther Grayhan, in 1829; Orson Packard, in 1828; George Renwick, in 1827; John Renwick, in 1825; Joseph Stevens, in 1826; Samuel, John and Robert McCormick, three brothers, in 1827; Ashley Root, in 1830:

Capt. Ira Rider, in 1830; Capt. Robert Purdy, in 1831; but dwelt on that portion of his farm in Lyon, a township of Oakland county, ultimately moving into Salem in 1835; John Belgrave and Benjamin Pryor, in 1831; Alexis Packard, in September, 1831; Henry Bowers and John Freeman, in 1830; George King, in 1831, and Rev. Eben Carpenter, the same year; Lyman Corban located on section 24 in 1828; Daniel, Rufus and Elijah Herrick settled here in 1832; John Ceeley and Troiles Bennett, in September, 1831; Eliphalet Lewis, in the fall of 1831; Charles Lewis, in 1828; Thomas Bussey, in 1828; James Murray, in 1828; in 1831 Seth Thompson, Reuben Peebles, David Peebles and Rev. Hiram Hamilton, settled in the township. Eliakim Walker and Peres Walker located section 9, in May, 1831; two years later, in May, 1833, settled in the township; E. O. Smith, located on section 11, where the D. L. & N. depot now stands, in 1830; D. N. Smith in 1833; Peter Lane, in 1836; T. D. Lane, in 1836; John Van Sickles and Peter Larkings, in 1831. Larkings settled on section 1, immediately after his coming into the township. Rev. Moses Clarke, the first Baptist minister, located in Salem in 1832; in 1825 he settled near Geddesburg, where he resided until coming to Salem. Phineas Clarke opened a blacksmith shop on e. $\frac{1}{2}$, n. w. $\frac{1}{4}$ section 11, in 1832. Henry Yanson located on section 31, in 1831; E. C. Roberts came into the township in 1835; Elijah Coldren came in 1831, settling on section 13, now owned by his son Peter Coldren. James and Ellis Sober, in 1831. Doctors Edward Cook and Adam Spencer arrived about 1835. They were the first practicing physicians in Salem.

Among others who located here between the years of 1831 and 1835, were the following persons: Robert Shankland, Dudson Webster, Harrison Savage, Geo. H. E. M. Nalors, E. S. Warden, Ira Root, John Peebles, Warren Hamilton, Andrew Rogers, John B., Smith, Wm. B. Mead, Theran Wykuf, John Hart, Henry Whipple, Henry Forshee, Geo. Nelson, Anson Cary, Darwin D. Cook, Geo McCormick, Orange Woodworth, John Waterman, Luke Dake, Lemuel Dwelle, Anthony Farley, Martin Korabacher, Jonathan Kingsley, Ida Ham, J. B. Van Atta, Ephraim E. Edmond, Simmons Harvey Knapp, Levi Westfall, Asa Corson, Atchinson Moses, Richard Walter, D. Corson, Sylvester and Jerome Sober, and John Davis; Stephen Haywood located lands on section 15 in 1831; Calvin Wheeler located on section 11, September, 1830. Isaac Winkup came to Salem while a youth, and for many years took a very leading part in public affairs of that section of the county.

In the list of early purchasers of the lands of Salem, mention will be made of many pioneers who came at a later date. Before passing from this subject it is well to add, that Rufus Thayer located the e. $\frac{1}{2}$ of n. e. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 13, it being the first land entered in Salem, and also a tract of land in Plymouth township. Having resided in the latter, his name will be associated with its history.

A SERIES OF FIRST EVENTS.

Mrs. Peters, wife of Jesse Peters, who came into the township early in 1825, was four months here before she met her sister pioneer, Mrs. Amy Dickenson. Though the latter was undoubtedly here before Mrs. Peters, both of them may be termed the first white women ever seen in the district. At this early day the red men and their squaws roamed through the bush in quest of game. Deer, bear, and wolves were here in large numbers, yet the Indians not satisfied with the rich food which such game afforded, would visit the houses of those settlers at intervals, begging for bread and tobacco, and often causing alarm in the homes of these Eastern women, who were not accustomed to see the barbarians in their wild state.

The first white child born in the township was Isaac Peters. He was the son of Jesse Peters, and appeared among the pioneers early in 1827.

The first death which occurred here is said to be that of William Jackson; but the first marriage was that of Elisha Comstock to Mary Black, in 1828.

Royal Wheelock was the first justice of the peace, having received his appointment from Gov. Cass in 1829. George Renwick was the first supervisor; and Alexis Packard, first township clerk.

Captain Ira Rider was the first postmaster, having charge of the office established in 1832, a little west of Lapham's Corners, and one mile south of the center of the town known as Salem. This was discontinued to give place to the present office of Salem.

The first saw-mill was built in 1829, on a stream forming the east branch of the River Rouge. Joseph Lapham was the builder and owner.

George Renwick was the first settler of Salem who was elected a member of the Territorial Council, and subsequently of the State Legislature.

Mr. Dickenson erected the first log barn and the first frame one. Edmond Pratt built the first log cabin. The former was the first man to become an honorary money-lender, the latter was the first honorary borrower.

Rev. Eben Carpenter was the first preacher of the Baptist Church at Salem. He settled there in 1831, and acted a part in the organization of a Baptist society there two years later, in 1833.

John Freeman opened a tavern in the southeast corner of the township at a very early day. It soon "passed" into the "past," and has never returned. It was the only industry of that kind ever introduced to the people of Salem.

James Sober, now 88 years of age, was the first veteran of the war of 1812 who ever settled in Salem. He was followed soon after by Edward Dake, who has since passed away.

In that memorable war between Michigan and Ohio, known as the "Toledo war," D. N. Smith was a veteran, and the first to enter the ranks. Joseph Lapham was Quartermaster, Isaac Pratt and Ira Hubbard were veterans of the rank and file. Calvin Wheeler, who was then Captain of militia, called out his troops, but seeing no danger while Uncle Sam was present, he concluded to remain at his post to await orders.

Rev. Hiram Hamilton and Mr. Olds were the first preachers to the Salem Presbyterian Church, in 1833. Deacons Pratt and Hamilton were its first officers.

James Murray, who settled on section 22, in 1828, was the first store-keeper in the township. He, however, removed to another township shortly after.

Rev. Moses Clark was the first preacher who gave services in the township. As early as 1832 he preached in a log school-house then standing near Bullock's Corners, also in several private houses. He was also the first pastor of the Baptist Church.

Phineas Clark, son of Rev. M. Clark, was the first blacksmith in the town, having located a shop on the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the N. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 11, in 1832.

E. C. Roberts is the first of the pioneers who taught school for any great number of years in the township. Between 1835 and 1862 he taught 27 terms, Mr. Lane coming next in the noble work, with 17 terms to his credit.

The first questioners of the power of township officers or Boards to raise money by vote for aiding in the construction of railroads, were citizens of Salem. They succeeded in their suit.

The first orchard was set out by Dr. Mason, who platted a nursery on the S. E. qr. of section 28. Calvin Wheeler planted an orchard in 1832, obtaining his trees from Mason's nursery, and some from Dr. Vincent's nursery, of New York State. Alexis Packard set out an orchard about the same time. Early in 1832, Eliakim Walker brought trees from New York and planted an orchard on section 9, where some of the old trees yet live. About the same time other orchards were planted.

Eastman, Van Sickle and Van Houghton were the only members of the Salem community who ever enjoyed the hospitalities of the State's prison, or, as it was then called, "The Tamaracks." Their crime was simply that of counterfeiting and horse-stealing.

The three veterans of the war of 1812, now residing in Salem township, are: John W. Van Sickle, born Sept. 15, 1787; Rob't Shankland, born Nov. 3, 1791; and James Sober, born April 25, 1793.

SURVEY AND RESURVEY.

As early as 1816, Surveyor Wampum visited this township, perhaps, and reported having made a survey. Immediately after Dickenson's settlement, when other immigrants flocked thither to locate their lands, they found that if Wampum's descriptions were correct, the sun, moon and stars were wrong. Later, however, they convinced themselves that the planets did not err; that Wampum conceived a series of peculiar lines seldom conceived hitherto, and that his labors were falsely directed and most unsatisfactory. The story of this survey is thus told:

“The original survey of the township of Salem was made, or guessed at, in 1816. The settlement of the township commenced in 1825, and it was not long after this before the pioneers of Salem began to discover that there was something wrong about the lines. As a matter of fact, in many cases they could find no lines at all. They could not properly locate their lands. They knew not where to construct their fences, build their houses, or plant their orchards; and many an angry discussion and bitter quarrel took place in regard to this matter. In 1842 the contention and strife, the disquiet and anxiety with respect to the lines on the part of the people of Salem had become so great that they caused a memorial to be sent to Congress praying for a resurvey of the township. The Government granted their request, and a resurvey of the township was made in 1844. The resurvey was made by Harvey Parke, and is known as the “Parke survey.” And now the wretched condition of the original survey was more fully disclosed. Of the 60 miles of subdivision lines returned in the original survey as run and marked, 24½ miles were never run at all, and many that were run and marked were exceedingly erroneous. The new survey also discovered the fact that the township itself was deficient in land. The Government had sold to the people of Salem 631 acres of land more than they ever owned in that township. To make matters worse 147 purchasers of lands had got in the aggregate 382 acres more than they paid for. The purchasers of the remaining 128 tracts got 1,013 acres less than they paid for. Pioneers of Salem had been led to believe that if they could only get a new survey each person would, at least, get as much land as he had paid for. You may judge their surprise then, when the new surveyor told them that his instructions required him to look up the old lines and re-establish them, and only make new lines where he could find no old ones. So that the old survey, as far as it went, grossly fraudulent and deceptive as it was, was re-established. This was a severe blow to the owners of deficient tracts. Many of these owners were men of slender means, and had vested all, or nearly all, their available substance in the purchase of these lands. It is true that some of them lost but little, but others lost a large portion of their land, and in some cases they lost more than one-third of the land they had paid for. They not only lost their land but they suffered the mortification of having it taken from them after they had contended so long, so earnestly and so justly for it. But the Government had spoken and must be obeyed. They then prayed Congress for relief. If they lost their land they wanted pay for it. The Government then ordered Lucius Lyon, Surveyor General of Detroit, to proceed to Salem, make a personal inspection of every deficient tract of land, take testimony, and estimate the damages sustained by the owners.

He did so, and his report was made the basis of an application to Congress for compensation. The matter was placed in the hands of Gov. Woodbridge, who was then United States Senator, and he procured the passage of a bill by the Senate making the necessary appropriation; but that being a short session the bill was not acted on in the House and did not become a law. The next year, Gov. Felch having succeeded Gov. Woodbridge in the Senate, the matter was transferred to him. But Gov. Felch was unable to procure the passage of the necessary bill unless the people of Salem would be satisfied with having the original purchase money for the lands they had lost returned to them. This was deemed at that time no just compensation and was indignantly refused. And there the matter rests, a stigma on the Government, for they knew the claim was a just one, not only from the sworn testimony of the people themselves who had lost their land, but from the testimony of Parke who made the resurvey, and of Lyon, who estimated the damages, both gentlemen the accredited officers of the Government."

TOPOGRAPHICAL AND INDUSTRIAL.

The Detroit, Lansing & Northern railroad, running through the northeast quarter of the township, and the Toledo & Ann Arbor railroad, through the northwest quarter, afford sufficient advantages to the agriculturists of the town. The depot of the former road is situate at the village of Salem, section 11, and that of the latter near Worden's saw-mill, on section 19. Salem village is a model hamlet. In giving a list of its industries, the peculiarly happy fact will become evident that it is minus a saloon. The post-office, from which is dispatched a daily mail, and which receives one, is under Calvin Wheeler; the express office is in charge of George S. Wheeler, who is also owner of one of the three stores there, the second operated by A. F. Van Atta, and the third, known as the "grange store," carried on by E. T. Walker, member of the Patrons of Husbandry Association. The saw-mill operated by S. W. C. Adams, and another by William Sutherland, form the main manufacturing interest of the town. George Nollar's blacksmith and machine shops, wherein agricultural implements are made and repaired, add to the importance of this township business center. A shoe and barber shop, kept by Mr. Simpson, the millinery and dress rooms of Mrs. and Miss Rider, the boarding house conducted by Mr. and Mrs. Webster, a Baptist church, and a group of 25 handsome dwelling-houses, form a very fair nucleus for the town of a future day.

LAPHAM'S CORNERS AND PEBBLES' CORNERS.

Lapham's is situated two miles south of Salem depot. It possesses a general store, of which T. H. Corson is proprietor; a wagon and blacksmith shop, and a dozen dwelling-houses. Peebles' Corners, on section 17, is the location of C. H. Cilley's store. The depot of the Toledo & Ann Arbor road is situated near Worden's steam saw-mill, on section 19. This saw-mill was built by the Hamiltons, prior to 1852, was subsequently purchased by Eli H. Webster, and ultimately by the present owner about the year 1863. All these industries are well supported, and the prospect of numerous additions to them is bright indeed. The population of Salem, Lapham's and Peeble's Corners may be set down in the aggregate at 200.

The township of Salem is said to comprise 19,620 acres, of which 13,829 are improved and 5,791 acres unimproved. There are 194 farms, which if equalized would give an average of 101.13 acres.

In 1879 there were 3,203 acres sown to wheat, which produced 70,594 bushels. The wheat area was not increased in 1880. Statistics dealing with the crops usually cultivated have not been furnished in full; but, from figures collected by Messrs. Wheeler, Walker and Lane, a committee appointed by the County Pioneer Society to collect valuable information for this work, it is learned that during the year 1880 no less than 39,122 bushels of wheat, 5,556 barrels of apples with large quantities of oats and barley were shipped from the Salem depot of the D. L. & N. R. R. Judging from these figures, the prosperous condition of the people, and the beauty of the township, it must be inferred that Wampum's lines do not render the soil less fertile, or the people less happy.

In traveling throughout the counties one is apt to wonder why so many windmills are in use. Such a one may presume that this novel piece of mechanism is only required in pumping water from the well beneath; few even dream of it following the example of that old mill once attacked by a child of romance, named Don Quixote. To understand all the uses of a windmill the learner must come to Salem. Here is one with a 22-foot wheel, supposed to be of six-horse power. It is capable of running a corn-grinder with a capacity of from 15 to 20 bushels per hour. A straw and fodder cutter may be operated by its power, and the prepared product hoisted into the upper floor of the barn. It runs a power corn-sheller, conveys the grain to the bins in the upper part of the barn, and carries such grain back again to be ground into meal. It runs a 28-inch buzz saw, while at the same time it pumps water to all parts of the farm, forcing it through 1,075 feet of half-inch pipe. This extraordinary windmill was gotten up in the farm-yard of A. T. Walker, and forms one of the few such mills fully utilized. The machinery in connection with this mill, together with a steam apparatus for steaming fodder and meal for stock, and heating water for scalding purposes, cost $1,500. There are many well-equipped farm yards within the township, but it is questionable whether one can be found to excel that under notice.

ORGANIC.

The township of Panama comprised the present towns of Salem and Superior until March, 1833, when the following act, introduced into the Territorial Legislative Assembly, by Geo. Renwick, was approved:

Be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, That all that part of the township of Panama, in the county of Washtenaw, comprised in surveyed township number 1 south, in range 7 east, be a township by the name of Salem, and the first township meeting shall be holden at the school-house near Jacob E. Bullock's, in said township, and that this act shall take effect and be in force on and after the first Monday in April next.

The first election of township officers under the new statute took place April 1, 1833, at a school-house near Wheaton Bullock's, then called Bullock's Corners. Geo. Renwick called the meeting to order; Samuel Mapes was appointed moderator, and Joseph Jackson, secretary. The election was carried out in due form, resulting in the choice of George Renwick, first Supervisor; Alexis Packard, first Clerk; John Dickenson, Calvin Wheeler and Welcome J. Partello Township Assessors; Chas. Dean, Joseph Jackson, Royal Wheelock, Leonard C. Goodale and Lucius Peet, School Inspectors; Isaac Hamilton, P. C. Murray and John Bennett, Trustees of school lots; Michael Thompson, George King and Royal Wheelock, Highway Commissioners; Joseph Lapham, Treasurer; Orange Green, Director of the poor; John Dickenson, Treasurer of the poor fund; Joseph Lapham and Peres Walker, Constables. Royal Wheelock was appointed a Justice of the Peace by Gov. Cass in 1829, and S. C. Goodale, by Gov. Porter in 1832. The men so appointed presided as justices until 1836, when the term of appointment lapsed, and the office was placed under the patronage of the people. In the following lists are given the names of those who have held the more important township positions.

EDUCATIONAL.

The advantages of education in Salem were not unlike those common to all new countries. The schools in the early day were small and school-houses were few and far between. The best of them were rude in construction and unpretentious in appearance. There has been some question as to the location of the first school-house within the boundary of the township, Mr. Wynkup, an old settler, claiming the location was on section 27. But the weight of authority fixes the location at Bullock's Corners, in 1829. This structure was built of hewn logs, and was considered a model of its kind. The first school was taught therein during the winter of 1829-'30 by Charles Dean. The second school-house was built on the northwest corner of section 15, in 1832. The first school here was taught by Miss Jane Jessups in the winter term of 1832-'3.

Regarding the first school-house, Isaac Wynkup says: "I understand that Mr. Wheeler of Salem has come to the conclusion that the first school-house in the township of Salem was built on section 27, and known as the "Bullock School-house." This, I think, is a mistake; my wife lived in the Bullock district when she was a young girl, and she says there was a school-house on section 31, and that she went to school there, because the Bullock school-house was not yet built." The Pioneer Committee, of which Messrs. Wheeler, Walker and Lane are members, still believe that the school-house to which Mr. Wynkup refers, was just outside the town line in section 6. of Superior township; and in this view, the majority of old settlers concur, holding that the first school-house built within the present boundaries of Salem, was that at Bullock's Corners. From the opinion of the majority there is no reason to dissent in this case. That opinion is founded on that belief, that the first school-house was built at Bullock's Corners in 1829, and the first school taught therein, during the winter of 1829-'30, by Charles Dean. This house was very humble in its appearance, constructed of unhewn logs scarcely six feet from floor to ceiling, having a small six-light window on each of three sides, furnished with slab seats set on pins, with a desk on three sides of the house; heated by a small box-stove, which was considered an improved and new method of heating, as very many school-houses at this time were warmed by a huge fire-place in one end of the house, on which was piled large logs of wood from four to eight feet in length. It was in structures of this kind that very many of the men who have built up this great commonwealth and given it character, received their early education.

There are now five full and six fractional school districts in Salem township. The school-houses are: One stone building, valued at $700, and four frame buildings, at $600 to $700 each in the full districts; and in the fractional districts, one handsome brick house, one stone house (on the Northfield and Salem line), and four frame buildings. There are 11 teachers, and an average attendance of 30 pupils at the schools. The attendance is regular, and a fair elementary education is offered.

THE CHURCHES.

The First Baptist Church was organized within the house of Wheaton Bullock, Jan. 17, 1833, with J. L. Twiss, moderator, and Thomas Harper, clerk. Elder Eben Carpenter preached the first sermon to the society, on the day of organization; Elder Moses Clark was the first pastor of the Church; L. C. Goodale, the first clerk, John Bennett and Eliphalet Lewis, first trustees; with Alexis Packard and John Bennett, deacons. Elder Clark served as minister for a short time after organization; when Elder Carpenter was appointed pastor. Elder Noyes was called to the pastorate about 1837. The pulpit has been filled by many preachers since that period.

Mrs. Almira Wheeler was the first member who received baptism. Rev. J. L. Twiss officiated at this ceremony, which took place in May, 1833. The church was erected in 1852, at a cost of $900. It was moved from its first location to the depot in 1877, at a cost of $300. Since its organization the society has advanced steadily, so that it now claims a membership of 100 persons.

The First Free Will Baptist Church of Salem was organized July 7, 1839, in the northeast part of the township of Salem. The Rev. C. P. Goodrich was pastor; Manley Smith, clerk; Michael Thompson, and Deacon James Filer, trustees. In 1850 the society erected a church edifice, which was dedicated in November of that year.

Congregational Church.—Several settlers of Salem township, who had previously worshiped with the Presbyterian Church, decided to form a society to be known as the Congregational Church, and a meeting was therefore called on March 27, 1839. The following persons gave their names as members of said society:

Isaac Hamilton, Charles Pratt, Ethiel Hubbard, Orange Green, Hiram Rhodes, Enoch C. Hamilton, Harvey Hubbard, Edwin Hubbard, Reuben Peebles, J. H. Peebles, Parley Crowell, Cola Bennett, Zebedee Waldron, S. G. Haywood, Sebra Perkins, George N. Stoddard, Seth Thompson, J. W. Hamilton, John Peebles, Lorin Pratt and Adam Spence. Zebedee Waldron, Adam Spence, S. G. Haywood, Parley Crowell, Harvey Hubbard and Joseph H. Peebles were the first trustees. Zebedee Waldron was the first secretary, and Harvey Hubbard the first treasurer. A call was extended to Hiram S. Hamilton to become the first pastor. A house of worship was commenced in 1848, and dedicated as "Zion Church," on Aug. 8, 1849. The cost of the building was about $900. The organization has been very prosperous, and has for its present pastor the Rev. Mr. Gilson.

The Presbyterian Church.--The Presbyterian Church was organized in the township of Salem in 1833. The first deacons were Isaac Hamilton and Nathaniel Terry. Subsequent to this organization, several Congregationalists settled in the district, who were not content with the society as it was found existing. A meeting was called and the society organized as a Presbyterian Church and Congregational Society. This society erected a house of worship about 1850, at a cost of $1,000. The names of the pastors since the organization are as follows: James Morton, 1852; J. D. Pierce, 1856; C. H. Eaton, 1858; Samuel Phillips, 1860; R. J. Williams, 1863; O. C. Thompson, 1867; E. F. Strickland, 1869; J. W. Was-tell, 1870; Robert Hoverden, 1871; M. B. Wilsey, 1874; Armon Spence, 1875; T. O. Childs, 1877; James Vinson, 1880. The present roll of members shows 40 names of males and 65 names of females. Of the aggregate number, 105, there are 26 absent members. The Sabbath-school, in connection with the Church, was organized in 1841 with a class of 15 members. The school has increased to 35.

The First Wesleyan Methodist Church of Salem was organized in a school-house on section 33, in 1841, with David Norton as class-leader, and Joseph Lapham, first steward. The first annual conference was held in that school-house, where also was formed the first Church discipline. Marcus Swift, Samuel Bibbins and Orin Doolittle were the first preachers. The first house of worship was built in 1851, at a cost of $840, near Lapham's Corners, or Brookville. The pastors have been as follows: B. F. Pritchard, J. G. Spaulding, J. H. Castor, A. W. Wilson, H. Noble, S. Clements and B. F. Hedger, the present pastor. The first Sunday-school was established in 1844 or 1845, with 20 members present. The average attendance now is about 50.

The Methodist Episcopal Church.--In 1864 the M. E. church, in Salem, was dedicated, and the Church organization was perfected, with a membership of about 25. J. B. Van Atta and William Hollingshead were made stewards, and A. M. Farley and L. D. Perkins, class-leaders. Previous to that time there had been a temporary Church organization and preaching at different points in the township by the M. E. ministers. The perfection of this Church organization was brought about by the earnest efforts of Elder Anderson, who was then preaching on this charge. The dedicatory services were performed by Elder J. M. Castor, who succeeded Elder Anderson. Since that period the membership of the Church has been largely increased until it numbers about 60. At the present time B. F. Hedger is the preacher in charge.

Salem has been represented in the Territorial and State Legislatures 14 terms, and in Constitutional Convention as follows: George Rennick served six terms, two in the Territorial and four in the State Legislature. In the law and theological departments she has not been so prolific, having furnished but four lawyers and one minister. She has furnished one county clerk, Leonard Goodale; one county treasurer, J. W. Babbitt; and one county superintendent of schools, Geo. S. Wheeler.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Below we give brief personal sketches of some of the leading residents of Salem township:

David Botsford was born in New Haven county, Conn., May 10, 1804, and is a son of Aaron and Comfort Botsford. When David was six years of age, his parents removed to the "Genesee country," in New York, where he was reared and educated. His father was born in Connecticut Feb. 29, 1763. At the age of 16 he entered the Continental army, and served till the close of the war. He died June 17, 1842, aged nearly 80 years. David came to Washtenaw county in October, 1829, and located on 160 acres of land in Ann Arbor tp., which he had entered of Government. In 1848 he removed to Superior tp., and in 1860, to Salem tp., where he has since resided. He was married March 12, 1829, to Thankful Levissee, born in Saratoga county, N. Y., July 15, 1803, and daughter of Aaron and Anna (Lamb) Levissee. Of their 7 children, 3 are living—Eunice, wife of William Graham; Sarah A., wife of William Wycoff, of Kansas; and Rosaltha, wife of Thomas Geer, a resident of Ann Arbor. Burnett, Burgill, Burton and Allen are deceased. Politically, Mr. Botsford is a Republican. He owns a farm of 117 acres on sec. 32.

Asahel Carey, a leading farmer of Salem tp., was a native of Seneca Co., N. Y., and was born May 4, 1834. His father, Matthew Carey, was born in Seneca Co., N. Y., June 26, 1807. His mother, Amanda Carey, was born in Pennsylvania in 1810. Asahel was reared in the country, and educated in the district schools. He was married Dec. 21, 1859, to Miss Jane E. Crager, daughter of Adam and Martha (Girard) Crager, who were natives of New Jersey. Mrs. Carey was born in Tompkins Co., N. Y., Aug. 10, 1836. To this union 1 child was born, Mattie E., born May 18, 1862. Mr. Carey removed to Salem tp., this county, in 1869. He owns a very valuable farm of 134 acres on secs. 23 and 26, all of which is under a fair state of cultivation. In 1880 Mr. C. erected a magnificent residence at a cost of $3,300. Politically, Mr. C. is a Republican. He is one of the enterprising and devoted men of Salem.

John Dickerson, the first white settler in Salem tp., was born in Morris county, N. J., Sept. 12, 1795. His parents, Charles and Huldah (Chamberlain) Dickerson, removed to Seneca county, N. Y., in 1798, where John passed his early life. He received but a limited education, the first summer school he attended being held in a barn. In the autumn of 1825 Mr. Dickerson, in company with his cousin, Joseph Dickerson, emigrated to Michigan. They came direct to Salem tp., when Mr. Dickerson entered three tracts of land, on secs. 12, 13 and 14. He also entered 80 acres in Wayne county. He returned to New York, and in July, 1826, came once more to his Western home. He built a log cabin, the first one in the tp., and then went to work to clear his land. The land was almost a wilderness, and the Indians during the day, the wild beasts during the night, were his only companions for many a long and wearisome day. Mr. Dickerson has prospered in the race through life, and has accumulated considerable property. He owns 270 acres of finely improved land adjoining Salem Station. He is a man of enterprise and unsurpassed generosity.

Stephen Ellis, farmer, sec. 20, Salem tp.; P. O., Ann Arbor; was born in Ontario county, N. Y., April 4, 1831. His parents were Benjamin and Mary Ellis, natives of Ontario and Herkimer counties, N. Y. They came to Oakland Co., Mich., in 1835, and Mr. Ellis entered 160 acres of land in Lyon tp., where he resided till death. Stephen was reared on a farm and educated in the common schools. Feb. 1, 1855, he married Betsey J. Prior, born in Salem tp. Sept. 11, 1831, and daughter of John Prior, born in England Oct. 30, 1802, who emigrated to America with his parents in 1805. He passed his early life in New York State. In 1831, with his brother Benjamin, he came to Salem tp., Washtenaw county, and entered 240 acres of land, which had not been correctly surveyed, and subsequently turned out to be only 140 acres. Mr. Prior was married Sept. 19, 1834, to Sybil Bardwell, and 2 children were born to them—Betsey J. (the wife of the subject of this sketch) and Ann L. Mrs. Prior died July 23, 1853. In politics Mr. Prior is Democratic. J. and Hannah (Lacy) Freeman, the former a native of New York and of English descent, and the latter of the Mohawk Valley, in New York, and of German ancestry. Mr. Freeman received a liberal education, and has been a tiller of the soil the greater part of his life. He was married Jan. 25, 1860, to Augusta Finton. They have 4 children—Elizabeth, Hattie, Asa Burton and Clara. Mrs. Freeman is a consistent member of the M. E. Church. Mr. G.'s parents removed and settled in Wayne county, in September, 1836, where Mr. Gorton purchased a tract of 363 acres. He died March 22, 1852. Mrs. G. died May 27, 1846. Thomas was reared and educated in Wayne county. In 1867 he came and settled in Salem on sec. 3, where he owns 200 acres, part of which lies in Oakland county. March 13, 1834, he married Ruby Burr, and had 4 children; of these 2 are living—Lancaster, married Susan Robinson, and Mary E. (now Mrs. Seley Bennett). Mrs. Gorton departed this life Dec. 12, 1860, and Aug. 15, 1861, Mr. G. married Esther A. Doane, a native of Cayuga county, N. Y., who was born Sept. 5, 1828, and they have had 1 child, Warren D., born Sept. 29, 1863. In politics Mr. G. is a stout Republican.

W. R. Hamilton, farmer, Salem tp., was born in Washtenaw county July 23, 1846. His parents were Warren and Anna Hamilton, the former a native of Madison Co., Mass., where he was born June 18, 1816, and the latter a native of Seneca Co., N. Y., born September, 1815. His father came to the county in 1833, and being in rather limited circumstances was employed as a day laborer for some three years. He then bought 80 acres of land, and subsequent additions increased it to 160. In 1868 he removed to Ann Arbor, where he died May 18, 1877. He assisted in the organization of the Congregational Church of Salem tp., and was a member of that denomination at the time of his death. W. R. Hamilton received a good education at the Ann Arbor High School. He was married Nov. 5, 1868, to Mary Manning, born in this county Dec. 18, 1847, and daughter of William E. and Emeline Manning, natives of New York. They have 3 children—Gertrude F., Reuben W. and Theresa. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton are members of the Congregational Church. Politically Mr. H. is Republican. He is a member of the executive committee of the Agricultural Society of Washtenaw County, and owns 300 acres of land, situated on secs. 17 and 20.

George Herrick was born in Salem tp. Dec. 16, 1845. His parents were Daniel and Mary Ann Herrick, the former born in New York August, 1793, and the latter a native of Connecticut, where she was born Dec. 28, 1800. They emigrated to Michigan in 1836, purchasing three tracts of land in Salem tp., where the former died Sept. 26, 1855, aged 62 years. Mrs. Herrick departed this life March 6, 1878, aged 78 years. George was educated in the Ypsilanti Seminary. He was married Sept. 9, 1868, to Carrie Britten, born in Livingston Co., N. Y., Aug. 18, 1846, and daughter of Richard and Eliza (Stewart) Britten. They have 4 children—Fred, Edward, Lavergne and Minnie. Mr. Herrick is a firm believer in the doctrines of the Republican party, and owns a valuable farm of 144 acres on sec. 3. His father served three months as a private in the war of 1812.

Thomas D. Lane, a prominent man in Salem, was born in Victor, Ontario Co., N. Y., June 26, 1820. He came with his parents, Peter C. and Malana Lane, to this county in 1836. His father was born Jan. 6, 1793, and served in the war of 1812. He was drafted into the British service and served three months, and was again drafted, but deserted and forced his way through the lines and enlisted in the American service, and devoted his time and labors to it till the close of the war. He died Jan. 5, 1852. Mrs. Lane died July 11, 1877. Thomas was reared on a farm and received his education in the rudest sort of log cabins. He remarks that most of his education was obtained by the light from burning "tamarack knots." Mr. Lane has held various offices of prominence, both in the county and State. He was inspector of common schools for 15 years, and was elected Justice of the Peace twice, but declined serving. He was a member of the Board of Supervisors four terms. In 1858 he was elected a member of the Legislature, and served acceptably one term. In 1860 he was chosen State Senator, and served one term, consisting of one regular and two special sessions. His father was a man quite prominent in Cattaraugus Co., N. Y., and held various offices of trust. The early life of Mr. Lane was spent in school-teaching, having taught for some 17 years. He is a self-acquired man, and has attained unto considerable eminence. He was married May 12, 1857, to Olive V. Webster, a native of Macomb Co., Mich., and was born Jan. 2, 1836. They have had 3 children; of these 2 are living, viz.: Webster P. (married Alice M. McFarland), and Chas. S. J. S. is deceased. Mrs. Lane's parents, Eli H. and Lucy A. Webster, were natives of Ontario and Monroe counties, N. Y.

Nathaniel Martin was born in Cayuga county, N. Y., Aug. 12, 1808, and is a son of John and Dorcas Martin, who were natives of Washington county, N. Y. Mr. Martin's father when a boy 13 or 14 years old, some time during the war of the Revolution, was on his way home from mill in company with another boy, and was captured by Indians who delivered him into the hands of the British after they had kept him some six weeks. His father procured a pass from the British General and finally, after a diligent search, found him. Nathaniel is the youngest of a family of 13 children, 10 of whom lived to the years of maturity. He and his brother John are the only ones of this family who survive. John is the oldest Baptist minister in the State of Michigan. Mr. Martin was married Oct. 7, 1828, to Almeda Canfield, by whom he has had 5 children; of these 3 are living, viz.: Joann (now Mrs. Levi Dake), Edward S. and Marjette. Mrs. Martin departed this life on March 8, 1879. Her birth dates back to Jan. 9, 1802. Mr. Martin came to Oakland county, Mich., and entered in Southfield tp., where he lived till 1854, when he located in Salem, this county. He owns a farm of 90 acres on sec. 11. In politics he advocates Republicanism.

George W. McCormick, farmer, sec. 33; P. O., Salem Station; was born in New York, in 1829, and is a son of John and Rachel (Buck) McCormick, natives of New York and of Irish and Scotch descent. He received his education in the Ypsilanti schools, but has been a farmer through life, in which business he has been more than ordinarily successful. He owns 280 acres of fertile land. He was married Jan. 10, 1855, to Polly Jane Rhorabacher. They have 1 child—Flora, wife of A. C. Curtis, who was born February, 1856. Mr. McCormick is a prominent farmer of Salem tp., and the county at large.

Philemon C. Murray, one of the very earliest settlers of Salem tp., was born in Northumberland tp., Saratoga county, N. Y., July 14, 1805, and was a son of Philemon H. and Lucy Murray, who removed to the "Black river country," when Mr. Murray was quite young, and subsequently to Auburn, in town of Owasco, Cayuga county, where he passed his early life. Mr. Murray's grandfathers were soldiers in the Continental army, and Mr. Murray well remembers seeing the soldiers during the war of 1812 passing by his father's house on their way to Buffalo, N. Y. Mr. Murray's father died when he was 12 years of age, and he was forced from that time on to do for himself. Soon after this bereavement his mother married Rev. Mr. Clark, and in 1824 they removed to Washtenaw county, locating on a tract of land previously purchased by Mr. Clark. Philemon remained in this county only four months, and during that time attended the first 4th of July celebration ever held in the county. In 1826 he came again to Michigan, and spent most of the summer in this State, in the meantime making a prospecting trip to White Pigeon prairie. He did not see a white man from the time he left Saline until he arrived at his destination. He encamped several nights with the Indians, one night at their village, named Notta-wa-sipa. He was absent about three weeks, and then returned to New York. In 1828 he made his last and final trip to this State, and in December entered 80 acres on sec. 15, Salem tp., and two years later 80 acres more on the same section. He still owns the land. Mr. Murray was present at the organization of Salem tp., and was chosen its first Highway Commissioner. He was Township Clerk for about 10 years. Mr. Murray was married Dec. 29, 1830, to Hannah E. Johnson, born in Newburgh, N. Y., May 1, 1813, and daughter of Michael and Eliza Johnson. Her uncle, John R. Bell, was a graduate of the West Point Military Academy, and served as a Colonel in the war of 1812. He was appointed and served as the first Military Governor of Florida after its purchase; he was promoted to Major and died at Henrietta, N. Y., still being in the service, and was buried with military honors. Ten children were born to this union, 7 of whom are living—George, who married Mary J. Knapp; Lucy A., wife of L. D. Cook; Eliza B., wife of D. D. Cook; Julia A., wife of Dr. M. M. Rorabacher; Philemon H., who married Louisa J. Rich; Mary A., wife of Newell A. Withee; and James H., who married Sophia Johnson. Marshall M., John W. and Sarah M. are deceased. Mr. Murray's portrait will be found in this volume.

A. C. Northrop, farmer, sec. 10, Salem tp.; P. O., Salem Station; was born in Pittsfield Co., Conn., Oct. 7, 1828. His father, Anson Northrop, served in the war of 1812. A. C. was raised a "farmer's boy," and received a common-school education. He emigrated to this county in 1869, and Nov. 17, 1870, married Mrs. Sarah Everett, widow of John Everett (deceased), who died Nov. 12, 1868, at the age of 56 years. Mrs. Northrop is a daughter of Lewis and Martha Webber, the former a native of Connecticut, and the latter of New York, and was born in Lewis Co., N. Y., Oct. 7, 1835. Her first husband, Mr. Everett, was a pioneer of Wayne Co., Mich., having accompanied his parents there at an early day. Mrs. Northrop was a resident of Detroit for several years. Her great-great-grandfather came to America with the little band of Puritans in the Mayflower, and landed on Plymouth Rock. Mr. Northrop is Democratic in politics, and owns 146 acres of good land on sec. 10.

Orson Packard, one of Salem's early and respected pioneers, was born in Ontario county (now Wayne county), N. Y., Jan. 23, 1806. His parents, John F. and Amity B. Packard, were natives of Massachusetts. Mr. Packard, as most boys, was reared on a farm and received only a common district schooling. April 3, 1828, he was married to Miss Rhoda Raymore, daughter of John and Sarah Raymore. Mrs. P., a native of Windham county, Vt., was born Aug. 27, 1806. They have had 4 children, viz.—Mary A. (now the wife of Levi C. Quackenbush), John F. (married Chloe M. Wheelock), Cynthia A. (now wife of Theron Wyckoff), and Harvey C. (married Louisa Bignall). In May, 1830, Mr. Packard removed to Washtenaw county. He entered 80 acres from "Uncle Sam" in Salem tp., where he settled down. Although deprived of many things, yet subject to the hardships of a frontier life they passed their first Michigan life. A log cabin was their place of shelter from the raging rain and snow-storms, the hungry wolf and the grizzly bears. All these animals infested the wood, and less numerous were the wild hunters, the Indians. Mr. Packard took a prominent part in the building of school-houses and churches. He was one of the organizers of the Wesleyan Methodist Society in that tp., which was the first of that denomination in this, our fair America, a land of Churches of all orders. He was present when the discipline of that Church was formed. Surely the name of Orson Packard will live in the history of the Wesleyan Methodist Church of America, as if engraven on a page of adamant rock, upon which future ages will look as they pass along one by one. Mr. and Mrs. Packard still retain their connections with that Church. In politics he is a Republican, but was formerly a Whig. He owns a farm of 64 acres on sec. 22.

George N. B. Renwick, a prominent farmer of Salem tp., was born in Seneca county, N. Y., June 4, 1827. His parents were George and Phœbe Renwick. His father was a native of England, and came to America when a young man. His mother was born in Seneca county, N. Y. In the fall of 1828 they removed to Michigan, and located three tracts of land on sec. 28, Salem tp., or what was then called "Panama" tp. Mr. Renwick aided in organizing the town of Salem, and was one of the framers of the constitution of the State. He was a member of the Territorial Legislature for four years, and for 10 years after it became a State. He was Supervisor of Salem for many years, and a Justice of the Peace, also. In politics, he was an "old time" Whig. The subject of this sketch was reared to manhood in Salem tp. He has followed agricultural pursuits through life, and at present owns a farm of 304 acres of secs. 27 and 28. In politics he was formerly Whig, but is now Independent. He is at present holding the office of Justice of the Peace.

John W. Renwick, farmer, secs. 28 and 29, Salem tp., is a son of George Renwick, and was born in Monroe county, N. Y., Feb. 14, 1825. His parents removed to Washtenaw county in October, 1828, and John W. grew to manhood among the busy and stirring scenes of pioneer life. His father being away from home the greater part of the time, the superintendence of the farm fell into the hands of John, who was the oldest child, and this hard labor in early life deprived him of those educational advantages which he was so earnestly striving for. He was married, April 5, 1849, to Amity B. Packard, born in Monroe Co., N. Y., Dec. 31, 1828, and daughter of Alexis and Prudence Packard. Eight children have been given them, 7 of whom are living—Ernest E., Alexis P., George D., Martha D., Mary, Jane and John. George is deceased. Mr. Renwick is a Republican, and owns 350 acres of land. Mrs. Renwick possesses 180 acres of land, situated on section 14.

His parents came to Wayne county, Mich., in the wild days of 1827 and settled in Livonia tp., where he entered land from the Government and lived till his death, which occurred in 1862, at the advanced age of 79 years. He served in the war of 1812. John was reared on a farm and received his education in the common country schools. He was married Jan. 8, 1846, to Adarima Eldridge, daughter of Nathaniel and Diana Eldridge, of Pennsylvania. Mrs. Rider was born in Wayne county, Mich., Mar. 29, 1828. They had 6 children, 5 of whom are living, viz.: Nathaniel, born July 25, 1848, and married Rosetta Hollis; Adalaide, born June 25, 1857; Franklin, born Sept. 26, 1853, and married Emma Kingsley; Dayton, born July 26, 1856, and married Dora Smith, and Mary, born Jan. 20, 1859, and now wife of Almond Smith. Mr. R. is a Republican in politics. He owns a farm of 152 acres on secs. 11 and 12.

Andrew Rodger was born in Montgomery county, N. Y., Feb. 11, 1813. His parents removed to Madison county, N. Y., when he was five years old, where he was reared and educated. In 1839 he came to this county and entered 40 acres on sec. 6, Salem tp. Nov. 8, 1842, he was married to Jane N. Bardwell, daughter of Jonathan and Betsey M. Bardwell, natives of Massachusetts. Mrs. Rodger was born in Madison county, N. Y., May 23, 1821. They have 1 child, William Clark, born April 15, 1849. Jonathan Bardwell, Mrs. R.'s father, was born April 23, 1779, and Mrs. B. was born Jan. 22, 1784. They settled in New York in 1796, where they lived until 1833, when they emigrated to Washtenaw county, and settled in Northfield tp., where he entered 120 acres of land. He died Aug. 17, 1848, and his wife, Mrs. Bardwell, died July 20, 1841. Mrs. Rodger was a pioneer school-teacher in Northfield and Salem tps. Her sister, Sybil Bardwell, was also among the first teachers of Northfield. Mr. and Mrs. Rodger were members of the Presbyterian Church. Their farm contains 160 acres, situated on secs. 5 and 6.

Robert Shankland, a veteran soldier in the war of 1812, was born in Otsego county, N. Y., Nov. 3, 1791. His parents were William and Margaret Shankland, the former a native of Otsego county, N. Y., born Aug. 15, 1762, and the latter of Scotland, born Oct. 15, 1770. Her parents emigrated to America at a very early day. Mr. Shankland, the father of our subject, served as a private through the Revolutionary war. He died April 17, 1850, aged nearly 88 years, and Mrs. Shankland Nov. 10, 1850. Robert passed his early life on a farm, and received a common-school education. He enlisted in the war of 1812, July of that year, in Capt. Blakesley's company. During his first term of service he was stationed at Oswego, N. Y., as guard. October, 1814, he re-enlisted, this time in Capt. Draper's company. He remained at Sacket's Harbor during his last military service, and participated in the conflict in capturing the three British boats at Henderson's Harbor, under command of Major Apling. Mr. Shankland served in all about 14 months, and now draws a pension. In August, 1830, he came to this county and entered 80 acres on sec. 35, Ann Arbor tp., and built a log cabin, and Nov. 16, he took his abode within its massive log walls. He lived there until 1837, when he purchased his present home. He was married Aug. 11, 1824, to Miss Arabella Bennett, a native of Worcester county, Mass., born Oct. 7, 1799. This union resulted in 8 children, 5 of whom are now living—Thomas E., Caroline (now Mrs. Ira Root), Andrew J. Veeder L., and Margaret (now Mrs. Hart). William H., James and Arabella are deceased. Mrs. S. died May 13, 1855, aged nearly 56. Mr. S. owns a farm of 126 acres on sec. 32. In politics he is a Democrat.

Eli O. Smith, an honored pioneer of Washtenaw Co., was born in Ontario Co., N. Y., June 27, 1810. He lived on a farm until of age. In 1830, he emigrated to Michigan, and entered 80 acres of land in Salem tp., on which Salem Station now stands. This land patent was signed by John Q. Adams. He returned to New York, when he disposed of his property, and in 1836, came again to Michigan. He built a log cabin and commenced life in a very humble manner. He was a carpenter by trade, and worked at that business for over 10 years, in the meantime devoting his spare moments to clearing his farm. He has passed the remainder of life in agricultural pursuits. Oct. 23, 1838, he married Isabel Harley, born in the German valley, N. J., Feb. 22, 1814, and daughter of Menard and Mary Harley, the former a native of Germantown, N. J., and the latter of Philadelphia, Pa. Of their 3 children, 1 survives—Dewelle E., who was born June 15, 1846. He married Rosa Van Atta, and they have 1 child, Floyd U.; Mary L. (deceased) died Jan. 20, 1860, at the early age of 20 years. She was remarkably intelligent, and a devoted Christian. Sarah C. is also deceased. Mr. Smith is Republican in politics.

James was educated at the Fairfield Academy; and Jan. 13, 1835, he was married to Maria Hulsey, who was born in New York July 1, 1811. Four children were born to this union, 3 of whom survive—Martha A., Emily N. and Archibald. One son, Nathan J. (deceased), at the response of the President's call for 75,000 men in 1862, enlisted in Co. C, 151st Reg. N. Y. Vol. Inf., and participated in the engagement at Cold Harbor, June 3, 1864, when he received a fatal wound. Mr. Smith removed to Ann Arbor in 1854, and nine years later to Salem tp., where he has since resided, engaged in agricultural pursuits. He owns 120 acres of well-improved land on sec. 7, and is Republican in politics. His Grandfather Smith was a Colonel in the Revolutionary war.

James Sober, one of Salem's veteran soldiers in the war of 1812, was born in New Jersey April 25, 1793. When he was two years of age his father removed to Bennington county, Vt., where he was reared until 12 years old, when he went to Otsego county, N. Y., and learned the brick-making trade. In 1810 he went to Phelps, Ontario county, N. Y., and was engaged as a foreman in a brick manufactory during the summer months, and during the winter months he worked in a mill. Mr. Sober enlisted in the war of 1812, September, 1813, in Capt. Clark's company. He served one term (three months), then re-enlisted under Capt. Elias Cass and served another three months, at the expiration of which time he enlisted in Capt. A. J. Graham's company and served till the close of that memorable war. He participated in the conflict at Fort George. A portion of his military service was under Gen. Winfield Scott. He was also the life guard of Col. Philetas Swift for a time. Mr. Sober possessed a spirit of moral and undaunted courage seldom equaled in man. He volunteered one night to stand on guard at a picket post where three men had been killed in succession the three previous nights by an Indian chief, but Mr. Indian failed to put in an appearance, and Mr. S. was not favored with the opportunity of displaying his expertness with his rifle. In 1831 he came to Salem tp., this county, and entered land from "Uncle Sam." He then returned to New York, and the next year removed his family to his Michigan home. The first seven years of his life in Michigan he bought and sold land, but since that has pursued the avocation of farming. Wild animals were very numerous, and Mr. Sober would frequently dispatch a deer or turkey that would frequent his cabin-home yard. May 11, 1817, he married Clarissa Allen, by whom he had 11 children, 5 of whom are living—Jerome B., Wilbur E. H., Sylvester C., Emily M. (now wife of Heman Barnard,) and Hester A. (now wife of Charles Walker). Mrs. Sober is a daughter of John and Amy Allen, and was born in Farmington county, Conn., April 21, 1795. Mr. and Mrs. Sober are the oldest and longest married couple now living in Salem tp., and are members of the M. E. Church. He is a Republican. Mr. S. draws a pension for his services in the war of 1812.

He was married, April 19, 1860, to Lydia Dennis, born in Wayne Co., N. Y., Oct. 5, 1840, and daughter of F. A. and Lydia Dennis. Of their 5 children 3 are living—Carrie E., Lizzie and Fred S. Mr. Sober owns 195 acres of land on secs. 16 and 21, also 80 acres on sec. 1, Pittsfield tp.

A. F. Van Atta, merchant, Salem Station, was born in this county Feb. 25, 1842. His parents, Aaron B. and Ellen R. Van Atta were early pioneers of Washtenaw county. Mr. Van Atta was reared on a farm and completed his educational training at the Ann Arbor High School. He followed farming until the spring of 1876, when he opened a "general store" at Salem, where he has since been engaged. He was married May 20, 1862, to Maria Walker, and 4 children have been sent to bless this union—Tid. I., Dora A., LeRoy W. and Jane M. Politically Mr. Van Atta is a member of the Greenback party. He is a successful farmer and owns 120 acres of land on secs. 12 and 13, in Northfield tp., besides 120 acres in Salem tp.

James B. Van Atta.—This gentleman is one of the pioneers of Michigan, settling in the town of Independence, Oakland Co., Mich., in 1836. He is a native of the township of what is now known as Washington, Warren Co., N. J., and was born the 9th of March, 1812, making him nearly 70 years of age; his parents' names were Samuel and Margaret (Bryant) Van Atta, the first of German origin. The ancestors of each were very early settlers of New Jersey. Aaron Van Atta, grandfather of our subject, was a soldier in the army of General Washington during the war of Independence, and during the latter part of his life followed farming. He was a devout member and a Deacon in the Presbyterian Church, and died at the age of 72, in New Jersey, and at the house of his grandson, whose name appears at the head of this sketch.

The father of our subject died when J. B. was but 10 years of age, leaving a family of 11 children, and but a small property to support them.

When the subject of this sketch was 16 years of age he hired out to a wealthy slave-owner, James Dusenbery, as a waiter, at $3 per month, remaining some three months; this was the first money he ever earned and was given to his mother; the next year he hired to John Garrison to work on his farm for one year for $50 and a pair of coarse boots; at the end of the year, the $50 he presented to his mother, which enabled her to pay off the last claim against her farm of 70 acres. The paying of this money, he is wont to say, gave him more pleasure at the time than anything he had ever done. After this he farmed his mother's place until he was 23 years of age, when he was married to Miss Elizabeth Wise, a daughter of John Wise. The ceremony was performed in February, 1835. The young couple immediately moved to Belvidere, N. J., where he followed teaming and contracting for hauling sand for the bridge across the Delaware river at Belvidere: he contracted and hauled all the sand used in making this bridge. The fall of this year he came to Michigan to view the country, taking some eight weeks for the trip, and on the 28th of April, 1836, he and his wife with 1 child, left New Jersey, taking their household goods, which were hauled by a team of horses for the West. This was their conveyance as far as Cleveland, when they crossed the lake by steamer and landed in Detroit the 23d of May, 1836; from Detroit they drove to Pontiac, where they remained only a short time. Very soon Mr. Van Atta bought 120 acres of land in Oakland county; it was a complete wilderness and unimproved. He immediately erected a log house, into which he moved his family. He lived on this farm four years, during which time he improved 60 acres.

During the first fall he lived here, 500 Indians encamped about one mile from his house. The Indians were very much excited and made threats of massacre, on account of some of their number being killed in the vicinity the year previous; some 30 or 40 of the neighbors collected at a Mr. Petty's house for safety, barricading the same, organizing in military manner. Jacob W. Petty, now of Lawrence Kansas, was elected Captain, and Mr. Van Atta was elected Lieutenant. The siege lasted only one night, but it was a terrible one to the inmates of that log house, determined though they were to defend their families and their lives to the last extremity, still expecting to be overpowered and murdered by the savages.

During Mr. Van Atta's residence at this place he was elected Constable, which was no sinecure office in those days, as the country was infested with counterfeiters, horse thieves and other desperadoes—men who had given notice they could not be taken alive, so that it required a man of courage and nerve to attempt to bring them to justice. Mr. Van Atta filled this office with credit to himself and satisfaction to the community, and on one occasion arrested unassisted one of the worst of the desperadoes. The aid or assistant he had along deserted him at the last moment, but he landed his prisoner safely in jail.

In 1839 he sold his farm and moved to Washtenaw county, where he has lived ever since. He first lived in Northfield township, where he bought a farm. In this township he lived four years, during which time he served one year as the Assessor and one year as Treasurer of the town. In 1843 he had sold out all his landed estate in the county and bought a farm near Chicago, Ill., but sold it the following fall at a profit, when he bought the farm in Salem tp., where he now resides, then consisting of 160 acres, and now consists of 320 acres, all joining. The homestead is one of the finest improved in the county, the house costing $4,000, with fine grounds surrounding, the out-buildings costing nearly $3,000.

Mr. Van Atta and wife have had a family of 11 children: Abigail, who married S. Marion Smith; Margaret, who married Amos Lewis; she is now a widow; Hamilton, who married Caroline Smith; he is now deceased; Sarah M., who married Perry Austin; George S., married Adda Wells; Caroline A., who married Frank Ovenshire; James A., who married Jane Murray; Ann Eliza, who married David Farley; Mary C., who married David Perkins; Eunna J. who married Erastus Perkins; John W., who married Phoebe Murray. Of this large family Mr. Van Atta may well be proud, all being comfortably and nicely settled. Mr. Van Atta may be said to be a self-made man, having on his arrival in Michigan only about $300 in property, but with plenty of pluck and energy to push his fortunes. He has served in many positions, among which in an early day was as member and Treasurer of the Vigilance Committee. During the war of the great Rebellion probably no man in Salem was as prominent in securing recruits for, and raising war funds in aid of, the Union cause. He was appointed by the township, in public assembly, to attend the State Legislature and further a bill legalizing bounties voted, and giving power to tax for war purposes by the township board, which was faithfully and well accomplished.

Mr. Van Atta is a Democrat and has served his township in various offices, among which are Constable and Treasurer two years, Justice of Peace for short term, when he resigned, etc., etc. During the war Mr. Van Atta paid $1,700 in cash for war purposes and put in two substitutes.

Mr. V. has been a worthy and faithful member of the M. E. Church since 1842, and was a Steward of that body for 21 years. Mrs. V. is also a member of the same organization.

Mr. Van Atta's portrait is given in this volume.

John W. Vansickle is an old and honored citizen of Salem tp. He was born in Hunterdon, Mass., Sept. 15, 1787. He was a soldier in the war of 1812, a private in the New York militia, serving one term, passing most of the time as guard along the banks of the Niagara river. He now draws a pension for his honorable services. He came to Michigan and located land within the limits of the now Salem, tp., in 1831; also entered land in Plymouth tp., Wayne Co., but never located there. June 5, 1818, he married Mary Bogart, and 3 children were born to them, 2 of whom are living—Martin B. and Leah A., widow of Hiram B. Towsey, who died Jan. 11, 1874, aged 51 years. Mrs. Vansickle died in March, 1826. Mr. V. again married, Dec., 1828, to Susan Dickerson. Four children were born to this union, 2 of whom are living—George S., born Sept. 11, 1843, and Dec. 4, 1872, married Jennie A. Thayer, who was born in Wayne Co., Mich., Dec.

16, 1843. They have 1 child, Harry G., born Sept. 1, 1876. William D. is a resident of Wayne Co., Mich.; Charles and John are deceased. Mrs. Vansickle died July 20, 1853. Mr. Vansickle has been a member of the Northville Presbyterian Church for over half a century. Politically he is a Republican. Mr. Vansickle has attained to his 93d year. The vicissitudes of nearly a century, intermingled with the labors and trying scenes of pioneer life, have weighted down his shoulders and whitened his venerable locks, and soon he will be numbered with those who have passed to the other side.

1. L. Walker, M. D., Salem, was born in Salem tp., Washtenaw Co., Aug. 7, 1839. His parents were Eliakim and Nancy Walker, who came to this county in 1834. Dr. Walker was reared on a farm and educated at the Ypsilanti Seminary. In 1864 he began reading medicine with Dr. Albertson, of Detroit, where he remained one year. He then attended a course of lectures in the medical department of the University of Michigan, and was subsequently a student at the Cleveland Homœopathic Medical College, from which he graduated Feb. 14, 1869. The same year he returned to Salem tp., and began the practice of his profession. Dr. Walker is a member of the Township Board of Health, and a member of the Masonic fraternity. Politically he is a Republican. October 27, 1867, he was married to Jane A. Walker. They have 3 children—Nina U., Otis H. and Tisdale S. Mrs. Walker was born in this county July 29, 1844. Her parents, Otis H. and Sarah Walker, were natives of New York. Dr. Walker owns a good farm of 74 acres in sec. 13.

Eliakim Walker (deceased), one of Washtenaw's early pioneers, was born in Taunton, Mass., Feb. 6, 1801. He removed to Ontario county, N. Y., with his parents, in 1805, where he was reared and educated. He was married Sept. 18, 1823, to Nancy Wheeler, a native of Ontario county, N. Y., born June 14, 1802. To them were born 9 children, 3 of whom are now living, and all lived to maturity. Their names are as follows: Nancy J., born Aug. 22, 1824, and married to Benjamin Hicks; she died April 18, 1847; Chloe E., born April 22, 1826, and married William Thurber; she died Oct. 20, 1870; Emily C. J., born Dec. 29, 1827, and married George Renwick; she died April 17, 1874; E. T., whose biography is on the next page; Amy A., born Oct. 17, 1831, and married James Harmon; she died Oct. 7, 1856; George W., born Feb. 2, 1834, and died April 3, 1864; Mary J. N., born May 10, 1837, and died Feb. 26, 1862; Maria A., born Sept. 7, 1842, and married A. F. Van Atta, whose sketch is given on page 628. This family were very noted singers; George W., Mary J. and Amy A. were members of the renowned "Walker Family Concert Troupe" who traveled through Iowa, Indiana, Missouri, Wisconsin, Michigan, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York and Canada, occupying about six years in all. Mr. Walker and family removed to Michigan in 1835 and settled in Salem tp., where he lived till his death, April 30, 1865.

E. T. Walker, one of the prominent and active men of Salem township, was born in Ontario county, N. Y., Aug. 13, 1829. His parents were Eliakim and Nancy Walker, the former a native of Massachusetts, and the latter of Ontario county, N. Y. His parents removed to Salem, Washtenaw Co., in 1834, and located on sec. 16. His father died in April, 1865. His mother is still living. Mr. Walker passed his early life in the primeval forests of Salem, attending only the common schools, which then were not noted for their excellence. Mr. Walker was engaged in grain and produce dealing at Salem Station for about five years, and six years as dry-goods merchant. He is now the director of the grange store at Salem Station, which does a good cash business. He is one of the prominent leaders in the grange enterprise of that place. Mr. Walker is the owner of a farm of 160 acres on sec. 17, all finely improved. Mr. Walker was married Oct. 17, 1853 to Miss Isadore Hamm, daughter of Ida and Mary A. Hamm, natives of Vermont and New York respectively. Mrs. Walker is a native of Salem, born March 25, 1835. Mr. Walker held the office of Justice of the Peace one term. In politics he is a Democrat. He is one of the thorough business men of Salem, and is President of the Washtenaw County Agricultural Society.

S. A. Waterman, an enterprising farmer of Salem, was born July 25, 1846. His parents, John and Harriet Waterman, were natives of Surryshire, England. His father was born June 4, 1805, and his mother, Sept. 25, 1804. They married in England July 24, 1827, and emigrated to America in 1832, and settled in Hudson, N. Y., where they lived some two years; then came to Wayne county, Mich., and after three years' residence there they came to Salem, where they settled and purchased a farm on sec. 3, on which they lived until 1872, when they removed to Northville, where they still reside. July 4, 1877, they celebrated their golden wedding. Mr. Waterman, the subject of this sketch, was reared on a farm, and received a common-school education. Dec. 27, 1871, he was married to Miss Lydia Stanbro, daughter of Samuel and Sarah Stanbro, natives of New York. Mrs. Waterman was born in Salem June 12, 1847. This union was blessed with 1 child, Dawn Ethel, born Jan. 9, 1876. Mr. and Mrs. Waterman are members of the Congregational Church. In politics Mr. W. is a true Republican. He owns a farm of 80 acres on sec. 3, a part of the original homestead.

Levi Westfall (deceased) was born Jan. 18, 1813, and was married to Mary A. Smith, daughter of Peter and Betsey Smith. She was born in Seneca county, N. Y., July 24, 1814. They had 2 children, Jane E., born April 21, 184-, and now wife of Geo. E. Northrop; Lewis C. is deceased. Mr. Westfall and family removed to Wayne county, Mich., in 1831, and in 1839 he came into Salem tp., where he lived six years, then returned to Wayne county, where he lived till 1855, when he purchased land in Salem tp., and moved on to it, where he lived till his death, June 8, 1866. He was a member of the Masonic order for many years. He left a farm of 147 acres on sec. 9. $\frac{1}{2}$ Mrs. Westfall's parents were among the early pioneers of Wayne county, Mich. Her father was born in May, 1780.

Hon. Calvin Wheeler, of Salem tp., was born in Livingston Co., N. Y., Jan. 28, 1806. He is a son of Aaron and Sarah (Roberts) Wheeler, the former a native of Massachusetts, and the latter of Pennsylvania. Mr. Wheeler died in 1833, at the age of 63, and his wife followed him in 1863, at the advanced age of 84 years. Calvin was educated in his native State, and in 1830 came to Washtenaw county, located land on sections 10 and 11, of Salem tp., where he has since resided. Mr. Wheeler was married in New York in 1829, to Almira Smith, who was born at Bristol, Ontario Co., N. Y., March 10, 1808, and daughter of Daniel and Diadama Smith. In 1831 Mr. Wheeler removed his family to this State. At the time of the Toledo war, he raised a company of about 50 men, and was elected their Captain. They came as far as Ann Arbor, where Mr. Wheeler left them on account of illness in his family. They were soon after disbanded. Mr. Wheeler was one of the first Assessors of Salem tp., after its organization, and has held every township office, except constable. In 1851 he was elected to represent Washtenaw county in the Michigan Legislature. During the session of which he was a member, the laws conformatory to the new Constitution were passed. In 1872 Mr. W. was appointed Postmaster of Salem Station, which office he still fills. For eight years he was station agent of the D., L. & N. R. R., at the same place. Seven children were born to Mr. Wheeler, five of whom are living—George S., a prominent politician and merchant at Salem Station; Elizabeth, wife of Charles Ryder; she is now a widow since Sept., 1878; Almira, wife of Hiram B. Thayer, of Wayne Co., Mich.; Stephen C., a farmer of Salem tp.; Daniel Webster, a farmer of Salem tp.; Aaron C. died at the age of four years; and Mary C., after passing one year upon this earth. Mrs. Wheeler died March 16, 1872, and October 10, 1872, Mr. Wheeler married Hannah Wheeler, daughter of Benjamin Wheeler (deceased).

George S. Wheeler, a prominent merchant of Salem, was born in Livingston county, N. Y., April 22, 1830, and came to this county with his father's family (Calvin Wheeler), in the fall of 1831. He passed his early years on his father's farm, receiving during this time the advantages for acquiring an education afforded by the common schools of his neighborhood. At the age of 18 years he attended Cochran's Academy at Northfield for about two years, the following year the Ypsilanti Academy, when he entered Gregory's Commercial College at Detroit, where he graduated in the spring of 1851, then being 21 years of age. At this time he adopted teaching as a profession, taking charge of a select school at Eugene, Ind., for one year, during the same year reading law as a student in the office of Judge Soles; returning to this county he taught school for about two years, during which time he was married to Miss Maria P. Thayer on Dec. 27, 1854. She was born in Wayne county, Mich., July 6, 1829. The spring following he with his wife moved on to a farm at Green Oak, Livingston county, Mich; here he lived eight years, serving three years of the time as Supervisor of the tp. Aug. 27, 1862, he enlisted in Co. D, 5th Mich. Cavalry, to serve in the war of the Rebellion for three years, and was chosen 1st. Lieutenant. He served in that capacity until April, 1863, when he received an honorable discharge. He then returned home and engaged in the boot and shoe business at Ann Arbor for three years. In 1866 he was appointed Deputy County Treasurer, serving two years, in the meantime attending one course of lectures in the law department of Michigan University. In the spring of 1868 he was elected Superintendent of Schools for Washtenaw county, in which capacity he served six years. During his incumbency of above office in 1873 he established his present business as a general merchant at Salem in company with Warren E. Pray, and in Dec., 1879, bought out Mr. Pray's interest, since which time he has operated the business alone. Mr. Wheeler is a Republican in politics and has served Salem township in various local offices, among which are Superintendent of Schools and Supervisor for years; was also a candidate on the Republican ticket for State Senator in 1876, but was defeated. Mr. Wheeler is very pleasantly situated at Salem. They have had a family of 2 children, Fred C., born Nov. 2, 1868, and Charles T. (deceased). Mr. and Mrs. W. are members of the Congregational Church.

Stephen C. Wheeler, son of Calvin and Almira Wheeler, was born in Salem tp., Sept. 24, 1835. He was reared to manhood on a farm, and Aug. 21, 1862, enlisted in Co. D., 5th Michigan Cavalry, under Captain Simon and Gen. Sheridan. He participated in several serious engagements, and during the winter of 1864 in a field hospital. He was honorably discharged June 22, 1865, and after returning home, engaged in farming, which business he has since followed with fine success. He was married Dec. 27, 1866, to Mary C. Kingsley, born in Wayne county, Mich., Dec. 29, 1843, and daughter of Stephen Kingsley, an old pioneer of Wayne county. Mr. Kingsley served as a soldier in the Mich. Vol. Inf., and died in the Soldier's Hospital at Louisville, Ky., Aug. 20, 1864. Mrs. Kingsley has since married D. B. Rathburn. They have 1 child, Arthur C., born Nov. 23, 1870. Mr. and Mrs. Wheeler are earnest members of the regular Baptist Church. In politics Mr. Wheeler is Republican. He owns a farm of 80 acres on section 13.

Royal Wheelock. The subject of this sketch was born in West Bloomfield, Ontario Co., N. Y., on the 15th of April, 1801. He came to Michigan in the fall of the year 1825, and located a farm on secs. 24 and 25, Salem tp., on what has since been known as "Wheelock's Plains." This location was one of the very first in this township. He did not, however, settle on his land till in the year 1827. On that farm he lived from that time till his death. In 1829 he was appointed Justice of the Peace for Washtenaw county, by Lewis Cass, then Governor of Michigan Territory. This office he held for many consecutive terms. Aug. 5, 1832, he was united in marriage with Mary A. Pinckney, daughter of Joseph and Mary Pinckney, of New York. Mrs. Wheelock is a native of Sullivan county, N. Y., and was born July 25, 1814. To this union 5 children were born, viz.: Louisa M., born May 3, 1833, now wife of Geo. Root; Sarah A., born July 26, 1836, and now wife of Tunis Carson; Mary M., born April 7, 1835, and now wife of Wm. Murray; Lydia E. (deceased); Chas. P., born Sept. 29, 1841, and April 12, 1870, married Sarah Sheldon, a native of Wayne county, Mich., born June 6, 1849.

NORTHFIELD TOWNSHIP.

Washtenaw county offers subjects to the historian at once extensive and interesting. Perhaps in all the municipal divisions there is not one that excels Northfield in its connection with the history of the county. Here, in years gone by, old Okemos held his barbarous court and received his chivalrous and erratic neighbor, Peewy-tum. In the dim past the aboriginal hunters assembled to clear a portion of their hunting-grounds, and gave a large tract of their primeval forest to the flames, so that the plain thus formed might be the future meeting ground of the tribal braves. In after years, at a time within the recollection of the first settlers, the Indians assembled periodically here to carry out the ceremonies attendant on the observance of the White Dog Feast, and perhaps to sacrifice a dastard brave or sinning squaw on the altar of honor's god.

In 1823 Benjamin Sutton arrived on this beautiful Indian camping-ground, and in May, 1824, located the southwest quarter of section 35, and the east half of the southeast quarter of section 34, in what is now known as the township of Northfield. Toward the fall of the year a log cabin was erected by him, and the first steps were taken to convert that portion of the lovely wilderness into fertile fields. He was the pioneer.

In April, 1828, the first house destined for the purposes of education was erected there, but was not tenanted until May, 1829, when Miss Miranda Leland was appointed teacher. In September, 1829, a spelling and debating school was projected, and the following year a Sunday-school was organized by Mr. Murrell and presided over by Miss Parmelia Leland.

The first drove of cattle brought into the township was that purchased in Ohio, by Benjamin Sutton, in 1831. The second drove was purchased by him in Illinois, in 1832. This enterprise was attended with signal success. It conferred great benefits upon the new settlers, who then began to gather round the log house of the Sutton family, yielded some profit to the originator, and won for him the honor of being the first business man, as well as the pioneer of Northfield.

THE FATHER OF THE FIRST BRIDE.

Isaac Secord, in 1828, came to this township from Pontiac. He had a large family of small children. His wife was younger than himself and seemed more of a religious turn of mind.

S. F. Sears

About 1832 or 1833, after the Mormons had undertaken to evangelize the world, they sent some apostles to this neighborhood, and by their preaching poor Mrs. Secord's eyes were opened, and she saw the necessity of believing; and one cold winter day, near where now stands the Methodist Church, a hole was cut through the ice in a small pond or bayou, and the poor woman was immersed, believing from the "bottom of her soul" that the Mormon doctrine was the sure way to heaven.

Mr. Secord was a hunter. His trusty rifle was his constant companion. When hunting he was always alone, and guarded well his footsteps. Not a quiver of a leaf or motion of grass could escape his notice. An Indian he regarded as a thing of the woods. An adventure is told of him which serves to illustrate his character. Some time during the last war with England, Secord and his family resided in Canada. He was marching as a soldier in company with whites and Indians. On their way they passed by a thick clump of bushes. Secord took occasion to stop a moment, and as soon as he thought he could do it safely, made his way to the States.

Feeling lonely, he undertook the task of getting his family, and also acted as a spy from this side of the line. He acted with great caution, but was soon discovered. To escape was impossible, and to secrete himself was risky. He withdrew in true soldier-like order to an eminence in the open country, and there laid on his arms for two days in the grass. From this position he could see the soldiers and Indians hunting for him. As soon as they disappeared, he returned to the States, leaving his family to their fate. He had not been here long before they attempted to come. They were followed by soldiers with the expectation of falling in with him. On their way, in crossing the river Thames, a little daughter was born. She was named Joanna. They settled near Pontiac and remained there until they came here. From the circumstances which surrounded Joanna, her education could not be properly attended to. She grew to be a young woman and was married to William Jackson, at her father's house, in the month of June, 1830, by Judge Wilcoxon, of Ann Arbor. This was the first marriage in this town.

SETTLEMENT AND ORGANIZATION.

The story of the settlement and organization of this township has been often told by the first settler, Mr. Benj. Sutton, nor has his brother, Hon. Geo. Sutton, allowed the interesting history of his township to lie hidden. Throughout a long and useful life, he has not neglected his duty in this respect, and this historical sketch of Northfield is taken mainly from his paper, bearing evidence of great research on the part of Mr. Sutton. He states that in June, 1830, in company with his father and mother, brother Isaac and his wife, sister Nixon and her husband, and their two daughters, they arrived at the house of Benjamin Sutton, in the town of Northfield. At this time Northfield and other townships north of range 84 east, belonged to Ann Arbor for municipal purposes. The sun was setting in the west with its golden tinged canopy. The cattle and horses came up to be yarded for the night; the mosquitoes were holding a carnival in the open air to the annoyance of the poor bovines, and sheep had to be put in folds for safety from wolves. Benjamin Sutton bought his farm from the general Government in the year 1824, and had lived here about 6 years. His family consisted of wife and 6 children, one or two of whom had been born here. The eldest was about 18 or 19 years old. He lived in a double log house one and a half stories high. The logs were hewn inside and out, and there was only one chimney, and that was built of sticks, and mortar made of clay. The fire place was very large. It was then and for several years thereafter the custom to cook biscuit in bake kettles. The flour or meal was mixed with saleratus and buttermilk, then molded out in rolls and put in an iron bake-kettle. The kettle was put between hot coals and the bread or biscuit baked, and then served on the table with wild honey and fried deer steak. This was the first supper in Northfield.

THE FIRST NEWSPAPER

was the Emigrant, a paper published in Ann Arbor by Samuel W. Dexter, of Dexter village. It was Anti-Masonic in principle, and was the only county paper in circulation here for many years. It supported Hon. William Wirt for president.

ORGANIC.

The fall or winter of 1832, the people of Northfield, and the adjoining town north, in their wisdom thought they had been associated long enough in municipal government, and felt anxious to separate. Accordingly a meeting was called at Mr. Sutton's house, and measures of secession were agreed upon. A petition was drawn up and signed, asking the Legislative Council to pass an enabling act for self-government. The act was passed during the following winter, and they were authorized to form a government of their own, to be called Northfield. The next spring township officers were chosen. A call was made for a nominating caucus, to be held at the house of Harry Seymour, at Whitmore lake. The meeting was called to order and a chairman and secretary selected. The first man nominated for Supervisor was Rufus Matthews. Steven Lee being president, appeared to be very much excited at the name of Mr. Matthews. He jumped up on a large stump standing in the yard, and offered a resolution, that all the Anti-Masons should withdraw, and make out a ticket to be supported at the coming election. A good many went with Mr. Lee, and an Anti-Masonic ticket was presented for the suffrage of the people of Northfield at their first township meeting, and by that act two tickets were placed in the field at the first township meeting held on the first Monday in April in the year 1833. The records show that the election was held at the house of Benjamin Sutton, and that Rufus Matthews was chosen moderator, and Geo. Sutton clerk pro tem. A. F. Shoff and James Barr were elected clerks, and J. G. Leland justice of the peace, which formed the board. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year; John Renwick, Supervisor; Geo. Sutton, Township Clerk; Frederick Smith, Gilbert A. Gardner, and Abijah Shoff, Assessors; Nicholas Groves, and Joseph Lora, Overseers of the Poor; Philander Murray, Asahel Hubbard, and Joseph Lora, Commissioners of Highway; Joshua G. Leland, Abijah F. Shoff, and Asahel Hubbard, Committee on Schools; Gilbert A. Gardner, Frederick Smith, and Thomas J. Tettis, School Inspectors; Thomas J. Tettis, Marvel Secord, Constables.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS.

When Benjamin Sutton arrived in the township it was purely an oak-opening district; since that period extensive clearings have been made, the beautiful oaks which dotted the land have almost disappeared, except at long intervals, and then only where the transmutor possessed sufficient taste to admire them, and let them stand as so many relics of the outgoing past. In tracts not yet reclaimed may be found forests of sapling oaks. The creeks and streamlets of the township are numerous and insignificant, yet sufficient to afford many advantages, the absence of which would be fruitful of trouble to the agriculturist.

The lakes comprise Horse Shoe on sections 8 and 17, Whitmore lake, covering two-thirds of section 5, Dead lake on section 6, Mud lake and its feeding springs in section 4, and Jack lake in sections 10 and 11. These lakes are all in the northern sections, and are supplied by streams flowing from the southeast.

Almost the entire surface of Northfield is level with a dip to the northwest, interspersed with numerous lakes and marshes. The inhabitants have shown a great perseverance in constructing open ditches which drain the marshes, and lower the water in the lakes, thus adding very materially to the health of the town. It is estimated there are about 40 miles of open drains constructed. The products of the land are wheat, Indian corn, oats, barley, hay and potatoes. The inhabitants of Northfield, from the first settlement, with a small beginning, have exhibited a strong propensity to improve their condition, and acquire comfortable homes. Many of them left their "Father Land" to seek a home in the West. From the disadvantages that the people have suffered, having small means and the hardship of pioneer life, they can now congratulate themselves in having good and comfortable homes.

MINERALS.

Iron ore is found near the surface of the ground on the farm of F. S. Chapin, covering 15 or 20 acres of land; also on land owned by Anson Wheeler, on the old Keenan farm. The soil where the ore is found is of a yellowish hue. Mica is found on the farm of John George Gerlach.

CHARACTERISTICS.

The people of Northfield from the earliest settlements have exhibited a strong desire for educational and social enjoyment. Soon after the town was organized it was divided into school districts. School-houses were erected, and were soon occupied with teachers and pupils, and many of them grew up to fill important positions in society. "If the highlands produce poets," the people of the lowlands of Northfield can congratulate themselves on producing men of literary tastes and abilities. Judge L. Horrigan, of Memphis, Tenn., received a common-school education at the Sutton school-house in Northfield. Dr. John Kapp, Mayor of Ann Arbor, and his brother, Dr. C. Kapp, of Manchester, and Dr. H. Shurtleff, at the same place, Prof. T. Howard, of Notre Dame College, Indiana, at the Shaw school-house, and his brother, John Howard, at the same school. They afterward graduated at the Michigan University and became noted as lawyers and bankers at Memphis. P. McKernan, now circuit court commissioner, received his primary education at the Multoph school-house. Col. John Sessions, of Ann Arbor, received his first impression of a common-school education in Northfield and Green Oak. Dr. Dolen, of Lansing, and his brother now in college, attended school at the Moe school-house. Capt. R. Beahan, deceased, and John and William Cuthbert, of Chicago, went to school at Multoph Corners. Miss Shanahan, afterward known as "Mademoiselle de Isabell," was a scholar at the same school-house. Col. William Stevens was a student at Whitmore Lake, and Capt. Leland, deceased, received his primary education at the Leland school-house.

Dr. John Cuthbert, a "gentleman of the old school," who had received a liberal education in Ireland, purchased a farm in Northfield. In the year 1836 he came on with his family. The Doctor lived a retired life; books and authors were his constant companions. He tilled a small farm more for amusement than profit, and died in the year 1860. The doctor was a first cousin of John Mitchell, the Irish patriot, on his mother's side.

NEW IRELAND.

In the year 1831-'2 a few enterprising men who had left their homes in the "Green Isle," settled in the town. Father Kelly came the same year, and with the assistance of his few church people and Isaac Dickee, erected a log church on section 29. Mr. Sutton is happy to have it in his power to record the names of all those who contributed by their own hands in erecting this log edifice to the worship of the meek and lowly Savior. They were John Keenan, William Prindle, William Stubbs, John McKernan, Philip McKernan, John Sullivan, Michael Portal, John McIntyre, Michael Bennett, Peter Smith, Michael Neligan, Patrick Walsh, Michael Walsh, Patrick Donavin and Bryan Galligan.

A TRAVELER'S SKETCH.

The following sketch of one of the early settlers of Northfield was written by the Hon. John Renwick, a few years previous to his death. He states therein, "The first impression I had of the township of Northfield was in traveling through the south part of the town on the old Indian trail from Plymouth to Ann Arbor, in the year 1827. The township was in a state of nature except what was settled by Benjamin Sutton and Moses Allen. Mr. Benjamin Sutton was the pioneer of the town, having settled on his farm in 1824. He cut his way from the River Rouge. Mr. Sutton possessed all the requirements of the pioneer. First a strong robust constitution, a quick, deserving, and intellectual mind and a perseverance that never faltered. He was a man of uncommon hospitality. His house was a home for all the pioneers that passed into that section of the country. Such was the man, strong-minded and calculated to be admired in any society, none were above him, and few his equal."

As has been stated, the township was organized in 1832. The following is a copy of the Legislative enactment:

AN ACT to set off and organize the township of Northfield in the county of Washtenaw.

SECTION 1. Be it enacted by the Legislative Council of the Territory of Michigan, That all that part of the township of Ann Arbor, bounded on the east by the township of Panama, on the south by the township line running east and west, between towns one and two south, of range six east, and on the west and north, by the present boundaries of the township of Ann Arbor, in that part lying north of said line between said towns one and two south, be and the same is hereby set off into a separate township, and the name thereof shall be Northfield.

SEC. 2. That the first township meeting to be held in said township shall be held at the dwelling-house of Benjamin Sutton.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect from and after the last day of March, 1833.

AN INTRODUCTION TO A FEW PIONEERS.

Hon. John Renwick was born in the State of New York, of English parents. He received a common-school education; was married to Miss Eliza Pratt, and emigrated to Northfield in 1827, and died in 1866, leaving a wife and four children. His wife survived him two or three years. Mr. Renwick was too fond of reading and social enjoyment to be a very successful farmer, yet he acquired an ample fortune. His hospitality was liberal and generous, and no one went from his door wanting. He was fond of light reading—Cooper was his "ideal." Mr. Renwick was wholly imbued with American ideas. In politics he admired Henry Clay. His motto was "Circumstances make the man." He held several positions in the township as supervisor, town clerk, etc., and was elected once or twice to the State Legislature, which he filled with ability and honor.

Hon. Michael Stubbs resided here some time previous to 1830, and owned what is now known as the Thomas Fohey farm. Mr. Stubbs was elected one of the delegates to the Territorial Convention from Washtenaw county, which began in the city of Detroit, May 2, 1835. He was elected by the Democratic party who took the position that all who were in the Territory at the time of forming the constitution preparatory to being admitted to the Union, as a free and sovereign State should be considered inhabitants of said State of Michigan, and should be eligible to vote at future State elections. Mr. Stubbs was an ardent supporter of that doctrine, and contributed largely to promulgate it. Some few years afterward Mr. Stubbs sold his farm in Northfield and went to join his brother in Washington, D. C.

In the year 1826 Moses Allen emigrated from the State of New York with his family and settled on land adjoining Benj. Sutton's. He purchased the first apple-trees and peach-pits in the town and planted an orchard. In the year 1830 he sold out to Nathan Sutton's son, and moved to the town of Plymouth, Wayne county. He lived to acquire a large estate.

Aaron Van Atta was born in Warren county, N. J., in 1805. He married Miss Sidney Ann Banghart. They moved to Michigan in 1832. Mr. V. died in 1877, leaving six children. He was elected at different times to fill offices in the town. He was kind and generous to the poor, and during his life gave large sums of money to his children, and at his death left a handsome property to his heirs.

Joseph Lane purchased in 1826, 80 acres in the Sutton neighborhood. He put up a log house and made some other improvements, and in 1829 sold out to Nathaniel Brundage. The year after Mr. Brundage died, leaving a wife and four children. Mrs. Brundage lived to a good old age. Her son, Nelson Brundage, now resides on the homestead.

Prof. Michael Gibney, of Iowa, was born in Northfield. He received a common education at the Shaw school-house. Graduated in the literary and law departments of the University of Michigan. When at college he was known as the Websterian elocutionist.

Peter Sears was born in the town of Ashfield, Mass., Aug. 24, 1787; was married to a lady of the same town May 15, 1808; emigrated to Northfield in November, 1826. He settled on a good tract of land, that finally improved in value, and is worth to-day a handsome fortune. Mr. Sears retained to his death the custom of his New England ancestors, and died Jan. 18, 1867, highly respected by his friends and neighbors. Mrs. Sears died on the 22d day of February, 1875.

Mr. Solomon Sears, one of the sons, retains and still lives on the old homestead.

Rufus Matthews emigrated from the State of New York, and settled in Northfield in 1831. He held for several years the office of supervisor of the town; was chosen by the Board of Supervisors and held the office of commissioner of the county. He was one of the commissioners appointed to purchase the county poor-farm, and to superintend the location of buildings thereon. He was continued in office for several years thereafter as superintendent. He built the first frame bridge over the Huron river, at Ann Arbor, in 1832. Mr. Matthews was a man of fine executive and mechanical abilities, and in religious matters a strict disciplinarian. His house furnished many a poor sojourner hospitalities. A few years before his death he sold his farm to Calvin Mitchell, and moved to Ann Arbor. In his advanced age he suffered with rheumatism, and died in 1869.

Thomas Earl, now of Ann Arbor, of which honorable mention should be made, moved to Northfield in 1833. He lived there long enough to clear up a fine farm. After the death of his daughter, a fine young lady, he retired from the farm and went to Ann Arbor, where he still resides.

John Keenan purchased in the year 1830 or 1831 about six lots of land, and brought his family from the East the same year. Mr. Keenan was a man of fine stature, a nobleman by nature, a man of integrity and lover of justice. I knew him well, and only knew him to love him in common with his neighbors.

Christian Zook came in some time before 1830 or soon after. I can not speak personally of Mr. Zook. He came from Pennsylvania and purchased two 80-acre lots on the banks of Whitmore lake. In the year 1834 or 1835 there was quite an excitement in relation to the manufacturing of silk. It was thought by some that our climate was well adapted to the growth and preservation of the silkworm, and that fortunes could be made by it. Mr. Zook showed his earnestness in the enterprise by procuring and setting out a number of multicaulis mulberry trees for the worms to feed on during the working season. The trees have now grown to a large size and look healthy.

Michael Prindle emigrated to Washtenaw county in 1830. He was of Scotch descent, modest and unassuming, strictly honest and upright, and agreeable in conversation. His modesty was so great that he would not allow his name to be used in connection with any office. Mr. Prindle died some years ago in the full faith of the Christian religion.

Dr. N. S. Hallock came from New York to Northfield in 1833, where he practiced medicine for nearly 45 years. He also kept a shop for the repairing of watches and clocks. His residence was near the lake, and his farm was one of the best in the township. It is said that Dr. Hallock never rode on a railroad train, and what is more curious still was never in a railroad car.

George Sessions came with his family to this township from Madison county, New York, in September, 1833, and purchased six lots of land on sections 2 and 11. He was from one of the oldest New England families, being a descendant of Samuel Sessions, who was a resident of Andover, Mass., in 1677. George Sessions was born in South Wilbraham, Mass., in 1784. His father settled in Wilbraham soon after the close of the Revolutionary war and was one of the "Boston tea party" who threw overboard in Boston harbor the tea from England on which a tax was demanded, and which was one of the immediate causes of the Revolution. He married Eunice Mather, of Windsor, Conn., a very estimable woman and a descendant of the noted Cotton Mather, of Massachusetts colony. Mr. Sessions died about a year after he came to Northfield, leaving his widow and eight children who remained and cleared up one of the best farms in the township. The best part of this farm is still owned by Hanson Sessions, of Ann Arbor, the oldest member of the family, J. Q. A. Sessions of Ann Arbor, being the youngest. The other survivors are Mrs. Harriet A. Tracy, of Lansing, and George D. Sessions, of Van Buren county. Mrs. Sessions died Sept. 1, 1843. J. Q. A. Sessions is a graduate of the Michigan University, and is now a lawyer, living in Ann Arbor. He has taken active interest in writing up a true history of Washtenaw county. In 1879 he read before the Historical Society a graphic history of the city of Ann Arbor. He served three years in the army during the Rebellion and was 1st Lieut. of Company D, 7th Regiment of Michigan Cavalry. This regiment was a part of the brigade commanded by Gen. Custer.

Robert Shaw, with his wife and four children, came from Liverpool, England, where he kept a kiln for drying grain. By the ravages of fire he lost heavily, but managed to save a few thousands. He afterward emigrated to America, and in time settled in Northfield on a farm he had purchased from Benjamin Sutton, in 1833. He retained many traits of character peculiar to his former standing in England, which many of his neighbors who have formerly lived in Ireland can hardly tolerate. His ability was duly acknowledged, and he filled the offices of Justice of the Peace, Town Clerk, and other positions, with credit. During his residence in Northfield, he did a very large business, but the expenses were too great for his income. After some time he removed to Ann Arbor.

Harris Seymour was among the early settlers of Northfield township. He purchased his farm, located near Whitmore lake, in the fall of 1831, and had a party live there and improve it until 1833, when he took up his residence on the farm. He was employed as an accountant and general manager of the firm of Brown Brothers, of Ann Arbor, at that time one of the largest mercantile establishments west of Detroit. The firm sold out in 1832 and Mr. Seymour returned to his farm, where he resided until his death, in August, 1834. His land finally became the plat of the present village of Whitmore Lake. "Uncle Seymour," as he was known far and wide, was a man possessing a warm, genial nature, and well respected by all with whom he was acquainted. He died suddenly of the cholera, and was buried on his farm, but in 1854 his remains were removed to Ann Arbor.

Michael Quigley purchased Government land and moved into the town in the year 1833. He soon cleared up a nice farm and planted a large apple orchard and other fruit trees, but did not live long to enjoy the fruits of his labor. He was father to John Quigley, and father-in-law to P. Wall and P. Conners.

Gilbert A. Gardner was born in Seneca county, N. Y., and his wife, Mabel Baldrige, of the same place. They came to Northfield June 7, 1831. Mr. Gardner was a man of fine abilities, but did not have a constitution strong enough to endure the hardships of a pioneer life. He died in 1836, much regretted by his neighbors and friends. His wife is still alive and in the vigor of health. Mr. Gardner left one daughter, Augusta, who married Alonzo Doty, of Ann Arbor. Nathan Salyer married Mrs. Gardner in Seneca county, N. Y., Sept. 7, 1837, and moved to this county in September, 1839. In the year 1848 he was elected to the State Legislature, and subsequently held other offices in the town. He died in the year 1880, leaving two children, Judson Salyer and Mrs. Robert F. Brokaw.

Capt. John Moe emigrated with his family to the Territory in the year 1827, and purchased what afterward proved to be one of the most valuable tracts of land in Washtenaw county. There were few more intelligent, enterprising men than Capt. Moe. He died in 1855, aged 54 years. Abraham Moe, one of the members of the family, is still living and resides in Adrian.

Hon. J. G. Leland was born in Madison county, N. Y., in 1805. He received a common-school education, and was married to Miss Nancy Bly, and emigrated to Michigan and settled in the township of Ann Arbor in 1831. He stayed there a year or two and sold out to James Mowry, who owned a half interest in the farm, and purchased a farm in Northfield. Mr. Leland had great executive ability, a healthy, strong constitution, a perseverance that never faltered, and an indomitable will that never forsook him. Quick of apprehension, he could apply himself to any emergency. He was ambitious to acquire wealth and renown. He held by appointment the office of Justice of the Peace under Gov. Cass, in 1833, and subsequently many other township offices. In the years 1844 and 1846 he was elected a member of the State Legislature. During that session an act was passed to sell the Michigan Central railroad, in which he bore a conspicuous part. In the year 1869 Mr. Leland retired from business and moved to Ann Arbor, where he died in 1876. Mrs. Leland survived him only a few years. Their children are Mrs. C. H. Worden, Mrs. Ransom Townsend, Mrs. Hascall Laraway and Emory Leland, who still owns the old homestead in Northfield. Capt. Joshua Leland, another son, died in the army during the late war.

CHURCHES.

St. Patrick's Church.—About the year 1829, some two or three Catholic families came to the dense woods of Northfield, built log houses and commenced to clear the forests. In 1830 they were visited by Rev. Father Kelly, who said mass in their houses. In 1831 there were about ten Catholic families, and these good, devout people built in the spring of that same year a log church on the spot where now the pastoral residence is situated, and under the administration of Father Kelly the parish grew, attracting Catholics from all districts. In 1835 Rev. Father Morrissey was appointed parish priest of Northfield, and under his administration a frame church, 30x40 feet, was built in 1837. Father Morrisey left there in 1840. He was succeeded by Rev. Father Cullen. The parish at that time had about 90 families. Father Cullen took up his residence in Ann Arbor, and attended to the spiritual wants of both Northfield and Ann Arbor until 1864. In 1850 the 30x40 frame church had become too small, and a 30x60 addition was attached, which gave the building the form of a T. This church was dedicated by Rt. Rev. P. P. Lefevere, Bishop of the Diocese, under the name of St. Bridget's.

In 1864 Northfield again was restored to the primitive honor of being one of the first parishes of the diocese of Detroit, and Rev. Peter Wallace was appointed to link that broken succession. During his administration the rectory was built in 1865. Rev. Father Wallace left Northfield in 1873. He was succeeded by Rev. Father Lux, an able speaker, and a highly educated priest, but an invalid, who died in the beginning of June, 1874, after the short administration of eight months. Father Lux was born in Holland. He was succeeded the same year by Rev. Father A. Carrolan, who came in October and left in November. Dec. 5, 1874, he was succeeded by Rev. J. Van Waterschoot. Under his administration the present new church was built, the history of which follows:

Dec. 5, 1874, Rev. J. V. Waterschoot was appointed rector in Northfield after leaving St. Joseph, Berrien Co., Mich., where he had labored for nine years. Jan. 17, 1875, he began to speak of building a new church, as his predecessors had done before him. Discouraged by former attempts at building in Northfield, many members, if not the majority, laughed at the idea, and had made up their minds that it was not profitable to do so, and undoubtedly impossible it was, as he proposed to do it on a cash basis. Still, as he seemed to make so little of it, and promised not to make any debts, it would be, at least, as he said, worth trying. On the next day the first stones were brought to the spot by Messrs. Francis and James Hanlin. From that day till the building was completed all the materials were hauled and brought to the building spot by the unanimous zeal and praiseworthy efforts of the parishioners. The corner-stone was laid May 31, 1877, by the Very Rev. Edward Joos, assisted by Rev. Fathers Buyse, Delevere, Slattery and the pastor, in the presence of a great concourse of people. The outside building was completed on Oct. 19. Oct. 20, 1878, the church was dedicated by the Right Rev. C. H. Borgess, D. D., Bishop of Detroit, assisted by Rev. Fathers H. J. Schutjes, F. J. Van Erp, F. Slattery, Rev. Father Joseph and an immense concourse of people. The building is 44x88 feet, and the total cost was $10,000. The building committee were John Boyle, John Smith and John Coyle.

The Methodist Church.—In 1832 Rev. Alvin Billings preached at the Murray school-house. Nearly all the settlers in that neighborhood were from the State of New York. The same year he formed a class of the following persons: Isaac Burhans, Calvin Holmes, Sidney Smith and wife, Joel Smith, Orrin Jeffords and wife, Mr. Patte and wife, Orrison Leland and wife, and Mrs. Leet. Isaac Burhans was chosen class-leader. About the same time, or soon after, a class was formed at the Matthews school-house, and was recognized in the Methodist General Conference with stated preaching until about the year 1840. In the year 1847 a Methodist church was built at Leland's Corners and the two societies united, and was known as the First Methodist Church of Northfield. A burial-ground was laid out in connection with the church the same year.

There is also a Methodist church located at Whitmore Lake. The edifice is of frame and a credit to the society. As early as 1838 the people assembled for religious worship at the house of Christian Zook, which was situated on the lake.

Lutheran Church.—The first German Lutheran church was built in 1875 and dedicated the same year—Rev. Mr. Stein, of Germany, pastor. Its members were C. F. Kapp and wife, Abraham Steffin and wife, Frederick Bender and wife, George J. Cook and wife, Christian Rosenburger and wife, Jacob Swerget and wife, Mr. Ludwick and wife, George Kempf and wife, Christian Lutz and wife, Charles Procner and wife, Bernard Bower and wife, John Garlock and wife, Dr. Smith and wife, Christian Fry and wife, Mr. Waggoner, Henry Wessel and wife, Gottlob Bessinger and wife, Enso Giger, and John Kapp and wife. They have preaching on Sundays, and a school is taught in the basement of the church by the minister.

SUTTON SCHOOL-HOUSE.

There has been more or less talk among the historians of Washtenaw county relative to when and where the first school-house was built. Nelson Brundage's father came into the neighborhood in 1828. Nelson was then about seven or eight years old, and has lived there ever since. He thinks the first school-house was built in the year 1826, and the first school was taught by Sally Ann Green.

Mr. Hurd thought the school-house near Benjamin Sutton's was built in the spring of 1828, and the first school was taught by Miranda Leland. She and David Hurd were married the January following by Rev. Mr. Page. The school-house east of Sutton's was built in 1828 or 1829. The same winter a debating society was organized and spelling school taught, and in 1830 a Sunday-school was started under the care of a young man by the name of Merrell, assisted by Miss Parmelia Leland.

My first knowledge of the Sutton school-house was in the year 1830. It was built of logs with a small window beside the door and a four-pane sash on the other side, giving only a small amount of light for the inmates. The hearth was made of mortar cement, the chimney back was laid up with undressed stone for about four feet, and the rest was finished with what was called a "stick chimney" composed of mortar and sticks.

NAMES OF LAKES.

Whitmore lake receives its name under the following circumstances: Jonathan F. Stratton, who was the only surveyor in Wash-tenaw county at the time, in company with Mr. Whitmore, who lived near Ann Arbor, had been out "prospecting," as the old settlers called land-looking. On their way home they felt weary and tired, and as night was approaching they concluded to pitch their tent on the bank of the lake near by. The next morning after breakfast and the preliminaries for starting were through with, Mr. Stratton proposed to Mr. Whitmore that they give a name to the lake, and they called it Whitmore lake. It was so put on the maps and has since been known by that name.

Some time previous to 1830, a few of the old settlers of Northfield and adjoining towns had a "picnic party" on the 4th of July, on the bank of the lake, and christened Independence lake.

Jack lake was so called from the fact that Jack, a horse owned by Benjamin Sutton, strayed away from home. Jack was tracked by friendly Indians a distance of some six or seven miles, and found on a small island in the middle of the lake. Jack could not be got off except by means of a raft, owing to the softness of the shore.

Heary lake took its name from Michael Heary, who was one of the original purchasers of land adjoining the lake.

Van Atta lake was called after Aaron Van Atta, who was the first settler and who owned land adjoining.

Horse Shoe lake was so named from being in the shape of a horse shoe or crescent, having a small peninsula jutting in from the south side. The water is deep and contains a variety of fish. It covers about one section of land. The lake receives the waters of all the lakes and marshes in the town except Jack lake and Mud lake. A few years ago Joseph Pray purchased a farm near by, and through his influence principally, the lake was lowered about four feet by lowering the "outlet" which ran into the Huron river.

The first hotel at Whitmore Lake was kept by A. Burt. He remained landlord only a short time, when he sold out to Mr. Stevens in 1831 or 1833. Where the tavern then stood, two hotels have since been built. One is known as the Clifton House and the other the Whitmore Lake House. This lake is quite a noted summer resort, and is visited by hundreds of people during the hot months. The scenery in the vicinity is of great beauty, and the accommodations are ample for the entertainment of hundreds.

THE FIRST TEMPERANCE SOCIETY.

A temperance society was organized in Northfield as early as 1839 with 25 members. According to the by-laws of the society, a member could violate the pledge not exceeding two times, and on due proof of the third offense, he was unanimously "bounced." The by-laws were drawn up and signed by John Davis, John Renwick and S. H. Cram, committee. The next meeting of the society was held in a school-house near Robert Appleton's. Meetings were held four times a year. On Dec. 4, 1839, a constitution was adopted and an address was delivered by the Rev. Guy Beckley, on "The evils growing out of intemperance and the benefits resulting from a temperate course of living." At this meeting 10 men and three women signed the pledge. The first annual meeting of the society was held in a school-house near Philander Murray's on the 8th day of April, 1840, and the following officers were elected: President, Rufus Matthews; Vice President, Philander Murray; Secretary, Nathan Salyer. The following vigilance committee was also appointed: Jas. Huston, Orrin Jeffords, Robert Appleton, Horace Coy and John Renwick. The first Secretary of the society was J. G. Leland who was succeeded by Nathan Salyer, who held the office until 1846. This society continued in its good work until 1845, when the interest in the temperance cause seemed to wane; and before the close of the next year regular meetings were abandoned. No special efforts to advance the cause were made until the ribbon movement of 1878, when was organized through the influence of Father Van Waterschoot, of St. Patrick's Church, Dec. 25, 1877, with three members, Patrick Purtell, Thomas Kearney and Charles Ryan. The following officers were elected: President, Patrick Purtell; Secretary, Thomas Kearney; Treasurer, John McLaughlin. The society rapidly increased, and now numbers over 40 members. They have given two dramatic entertainments; one in St. Patrick's Church, and repeated it in the Opera House at Ann Arbor. The society has wielded a beneficent influence for good among the young men of Northern Washtenaw county, and deserves the best wishes of all temperance people. Each member wears a very neat and tasty silver badge with the words "St. P. T. S." handsomely engraved thereon. The present officers are: President, Patrick Purtell; Vice President, John Conlin; Secretary, James Welch; Treasurer, Michael Howard. Six counsellors are elected annually, whose duty it is to look after the society's poor, and also delinquent members.

Northfield Grange, No. 399, was organized April 18, 1874, and the following officers were duly elected and installed by an officer from Roseville, Mich.:—Master, George Sutton; Overseer, S. W. Shurtleff; Lecturer, C. K. Kapp; Steward, N. E. Sutton; Asst. Steward, T. T. Burlingame; Chaplain, William Doty; Treasurer, F. Kapp; Secretary, E. E. Leland; Gate-Keeper, A. Steffin; Ceres, Mrs. M. R. Shurtleff; Pomona, Sarah Kapp; Flora, Luena Steffin; Lady Asst. Steward, Miss C. A. Sutton. The lodge numbers 31 members, and is in a very prosperous condition.

SOME OF NORTHFIELD'S BOYS.

If "the highlands produce poets," the people of Northfield congratulate themselves on producing men of literary tastes and abilities.

Judge L. Horrigan, of Memphis, Tenn., received a common-school education at the Sutton school-house. Dr. John Kapp, Mayor of Ann Arbor; his brother, Dr. C. Kapp, of Manchester; Dr. H. Shurtleff, of the same place; Prof. T. E. Howard, of Notre Dame University, South Bend, Ind., and his brother, John Howard, received their early education at the Shaw school-house. P. McKernan, Circuit Court Commissioner of Washtenaw county, received his primary education at the Mutolph school-house. Col. John Sessions, of Ann Arbor, received his first impression of a common-school education in Northfield. Dr. Dolen, of Lansing, and his brother, attended school at the Moe school-house. Capt. Richard Beahan (dec.), and John and William Cuthbert, of Chicago, were pupils at Mutolph Corners. Miss Shanahon, subsequently known as "Mademoiselle d' Isabell," was a scholar at the same old school-house. Col. William Stevens was a student at Whitmore lake, and Capt. Leland (dec.) received his primary education at the Leland school-house.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

Below we give personal sketches of many of the leading citizens of Northfield township, whose lives are more or less identified with its history and in fact constitute an essential factor of the same.

Morgan W. Brain

E. T. Brokaw was born April 2, 1839, and is a life resident of this county. His parents, John and Catherine Brokaw, came to this country in 1838. Mr. Brokaw was educated in the common and Union schools of Ann Arbor. He has a wide reputation as a teacher, having taught some 12 or 15 years. At present he is devoting his time and attention to agricultural pursuits. He was married May 4, 1864, to Mrs. Mary Shelby, who was born Jan. 29, 1833, and daughter of D. B. and Jane (Appleton) Shelby. They have 3 children—Edith M., Ira E., and Roscoe T. Mrs. Brokaw's first husband was E. M. Shelby, a lawyer by profession. They were joined in marriage March 20, 1845. Mr. Shelby died in 1846.

Three children have been born in this family—Margaret, Ellen and John. Mr. Shanahan owns 62 acres of well-improved land. Mr. Shanahan and wife are members of the Roman Catholic Church.

Patrick Sheehey was born in Ireland Dec. 9, 1826, and is a son of Patrick and Honora Sheehey, the former of whom died in 1828. Mrs. Sheehey subsequently married Jeremiah Kennedy, and in 1832 they emigrated to America, remaining in Connecticut four years, at the expiration of which time they settled in Ann Arbor tp., Washtenaw county. Three years later they removed to Northfield tp., where the latter died Jan. 25, 1878, and the former, April 15, 1880. Patrick grew to manhood in Washtenaw, and April 15, 1853, married Mrs. Alice (O'Brien) Horigan, widow of Michael Horigan (deceased). They were married in 1847, and 2 children were born to them—Catherine and Mary. Mr. Horigan died in 1851. Mrs. Sheehey was born Dec. 15, 1822. Mr. and Mrs. Sheehey have 4 children—Patrick, Dennis, Jeremiah and Honora. Mr. Sheehey was a poor man when he commenced in life, but by industry, and economy has succeeded in accumulating considerable property. He now owns 226 acres of well-improved land. Mr. Sheehey and wife are members of the Roman Catholic Church.

Hon. George Sutton, one of the honored pioneers of Northfield tp., was born in Warren Co., N. J., Feb. 17, 1810, and was a son of Nathan and Sarah (Coleman) Sutton, natives of New Jersey, and of English descent. Mr. Sutton accompanied his father to Michigan in June, 1830, and located on a tract of land comprising 500 acres, in Northfield tp., where he resides at present. He has been a resident of Northfield tp. since his arrival in this county, and has uniformly been connected with different official positions in the tp. and county. He once represented Washtenaw county in the Michigan State Legislature. Mr. Sutton was married Oct. 25, 1835, to Catherine O. Pray, who was born in New York Jan. 19, 1820, and daughter of Esek and Sally Ann (Hammond) Pray, natives of Rhode Island, and of Scotch descent. They came to this county in 1826, where the former died July 5, 1856, and the latter Feb. 27, 1870. Mr. Sutton and wife are the parents of 3 children—Nathan E., who was born Jan. 17, 1841; Carrie A., born Jan. 14, 1853; Allie, born Nov. 29, 1859. Mr. Sutton has been very successful in his farming operations, and has accumulated a competency sufficient to enable him to pass the remainder of life in comfort and happiness. He is an active member of the Pioneer Society of Washtenaw County, and in that connection has assisted largely in gathering material and information for the valuable collections now in possession of the society.

Patrick Wall, an old pioneer and honored citizen of Washtenaw county, was born in Ireland Sept. 25, 1824. His parents, John and Catherine Wall, came to America in 1828, landing at Charleston, S. C. They proceeded northward, and located in Tioga county, N. Y., where they remained three years. At the latter period they went to Detroit, Mich., and in 1836 settled on sec. 10, Northfield tp., where Mr. Wall had purchased land from Government four years previous. He died at his residence June 18, 1854, and his wife followed him March 13, 1868. Of the 5 children born to them, 4 are living. Patrick was reared to manhood in Washtenaw county, and June 8, 1845, was married to Mary Doyle, who was born in New York in 1828. Six children were given to this union, 4 of whom survive—John L., James M., Mary E. and Thomas E. Mrs. Wall died March 4, 1876. Mr. Wall has followed agricultural pursuits the greater portion of his life, but has also been engaged in the milling, grain and produce business. He has held the offices of Constable, Supervisor and Deputy Sheriff, and is a member of the Roman Catholic Church.

Anson Wheeler, farmer, sec. 19, was born in Grafton Co., N. H. April 12, 1831. His parents were Anson and Martha Wheeler, who came to this county in 1838 and settled in Pittsfield tp., where the former died in August, 1870, and the latter a month later. Anson was reared on a farm and received a common-school education. He was married April 11, 1865, to Fannie Osborn, born May 27, 1835, and daughter of Horace and Waity Osborn. They have 3 children—Waity, Kate and Amanda. Mr. Wheeler has been very successful in his farming operations, and now owns 197 acres of valuable land.

WEBSTER TOWNSHIP.

The town of Webster, on the organization of the county, comprised a part of the town of Dexter, and was set off and organized by the Territorial Council, March, 1833, and given the name of Webster, in honor of the great statesman, Daniel Webster, then in the zenith of his political fame. Munnis Kenny has the credit of suggesting the name.

The first township meeting was held at the house of John Williams on the first Monday in April, 1833. Calvin Smith was elected Moderator; Pierpont L. Smith and Theodore Foster, Inspectors of Election, and Moses Kingsley, Clerk. At this election each of the township officers were elected separately, beginning with the supervisor and going through the list of officers to be elected. The election of supervisor was quite close, John Williams receiving 26 votes and Theophilus Crawford 25. Moses Kingsley was elected Clerk; Pierpont L. Smith, Solomon H. Matthews and Israel Anus, Assessors; Frederick B. Parsons, Constable and Collector; Sturms Kimberly, Russell Cooley and Charles Starks were chosen Highway Commissioners; Thomas Barber, Poor Director; Charles G. Clark, Peter Sears and Moses Kingsley, School Inspectors; Ira Seymour, Thomas Barber and Palmer Force, Commissioners of Schools.

We are indebted to Hon. J. D. Williams, now a resident of Ann Arbor, but for many years an active citizen of Webster, for much of the information contained in this sketch. The interest he has manifested in gathering up and preserving the history of this county, and especially of this town, deserves commendable mention.

Samuel W. Dexter was the first settler of the town of Webster. Mr. Dexter came to Detroit June 10, 1824, and located a large tract of land in this township. By the 23d of August he had erected a log house, the first here. In the fall, Mr. Dexter went back East, but returned in the summer of 1825. The house built by him was purchased in the fall of 1824, by Charles B. Taylor, who immediately occupied it with his family, thus becoming the first in the township.

Thomas Alexander, the first settler in the southeast part of the town, came from Wales, England. He did not come directly to Webster, but settled in the township of Ann Arbor. This was in the fall of 1825. He remained there until May 1, 1826, when he removed to Webster. He built a small shanty in which he lived until fall, when he erected a log house, where he resided until near the close of his life.

Luther Boyden came to Michigan in the spring of 1826, from Conway, Mass., and located upon section 36. He then returned East for his family, and came back in the following August.

Israel Anus settled in Webster in the fall of 1826, and lived here about 12 years, when he sold out and moved to Livingston county. He was from Massachusetts.

Charles Starks was the next settler. He came in the spring of 1827. Mr. Starks was born in Pennsylvania Jan. 8, 1799, and came to Michigan in 1819. He worked in and about Detroit for two years. At one time he was on a small vessel which ran up to Port Huron, and sometimes went to Mackinaw. On one of these trips across Lake Huron they encountered a storm in which they were shipwrecked on the west coast of the lake. The crew succeeded in reaching the shore without the loss of life. In this disaster Mr. Starks lost his all. The Indians, of whom there happened to be a company near the shore, took them in and very kindly cared for them as best they could, until they could set out on their way back to Detroit by land. This was enough of that kind of adventure for Mr. Starks. He made his way west from Detroit as far as a settlement then begun on the river Rouge. After a stay of about four years in this place, during which time he married a wife, he concluded to push on farther west. So in the spring of 1827 he located a piece of land on the north side of Boyden's Plains, and moved there with his family, stopping with Mr. Anus until a small house could be built. This house continued to be the residence of the family until the summer of 1848, when Mr. Starks built the brick house now owned by Robert McCall. For several years in middle life he made pump-making, as well as farming, his business. His was a manly struggle with the trials and privations of pioneer life. He took part in all the moral and religious enterprises of the community, and contributed his full share in the establishment of good society. He was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and it was at his house that the first sermon by a Methodist minister was preached in Webster. On the 26th day of March, 1828, was born in Mr. Starks' family a daughter, who subsequently married Hon. J. D. Williams, and became the first grandmother who was born in Webster.

Salmon H. Matthews arrived in Webster May 19, 1827, from Conway, Mass., and was the next settler. Mr. Matthews brought with him a wife and child, his wife's mother, Mrs. Bond, a widow, and two young sisters of Mrs. Matthews, Miss H. Bond and Miss M. Bond, the latter of whom became the wife of Hon. Samuel W. Dexter. Mr. Matthews did not remain long on his farm, when he removed to the village of Dexter and engaged in business, and where, after a few years, he died.

The next to locate in Webster was Peter Sears, who located the southeast corner lot in the township. Here Mr. Sears (Uncle Peter, as he was familiarly called) built his first house, and here he lived for a number of years. His farm embraced lands in the towns of Ann Arbor and Northfield, as well as Webster. The time of his arrival was June 1, 1827. Mr. Sears was a very eccentric man and many stories could be told of his peculiarity. His wife was a noble woman, universally loved by all who knew her.

Sturms Kimberly also came in the year 1827. He was a young man and unmarried at the time, but commenced the clearing of a farm, until recently occupied by his son Austin. Mr. Kimberly soon gained the respect and confidence of his brother pioneers, and was elected Supervisor in 1834, the second year of the organization of the town. He was subsequently elected to the same office for a number of terms, and also filled many other important offices and positions of trust in society with credit to himself and satisfaction to his fellow-citizens. He was a man of deeds, more than a man of words. His judgment respecting the affairs and relations of life were relied upon implicitly. Mr. Kimberly died about 10 years since.

Ezra Fish also came to Webster in 1827, and for a few years took a somewhat prominent part in society, but left for some place further West.

Ira Seymour came with his family in the year 1827. Mr. Seymour has long since passed away, and none of the family remain in the town.

John Williams arrived at Ann Arbor April 8, 1828, having left Sempronius, Cayuga Co., N. Y., on the 29th of March previous. He brought with him his three oldest boys, Spencer, Charles and Jeremiah. He was also accompanied by John Chandler, Jeremiah Fuller and Henry Seadin. Mr. Williams and his party reached Buffalo in time to take passage on the first boat on the opening of navigation. Says Jeremiah, one of the sons: "The engine of this boat was a high-pressure, and such a terrific snorting noise as was made by the escape of the steam was anything but pleasant to those unaccustomed to steamboating. After getting fairly out into the lake a pretty strong head-wind was encountered, and the boat, being a rather short, clumsy concern, was tossed about at a fearful rate to those not used to the water, and this being the first trip that spring, many of the sailors, as well as nearly all the passengers, were frightfully stomach-sick, or, as Mark Twain expresses himself in describing a similar scene, 'They all had the 'Oh my.' The stops were made at Dunkirk, Erie, Cleveland and Sandusky, and about night of the fourth day after leaving Buffalo, Detroit was reached and debarkation effected. The horses, on being landed on terre firma, found it difficult to accommodate themselves to the solid ground. It was quite amusing to see them stumble and blunder on being harnessed to the wagon and driven from the boat to the hotel; but spending one night on land was sufficient to restore them to their equilibrium. The party started for Washtenaw county the next morning after arriving at Detroit."

The first night Mr. Williams spent in Washtenaw county was at the house of Dr. Lord. The next day he went out to look at some land which he obtained in trade, but not being suited, he traveled over several townships and finally located in Webster township, on section 27. Mr. Williams was born in Orange county, N. Y., July 7, 1782. and on June 18, 1801, married Lydia Hughlitt. Ten children were born to them, eight of whom, four sons and four daughters, arrived at mature years. In early life Mr. Williams worked at the carpenter and joiner's trade, but subsequently devoted his attention to farming. In 1840 Mr. Williams was appointed appraiser on the public roads of the State, namely, canals and railroads. Mr. Williams received but a limited education, and in early life was a Presbyterian. He assisted in the erection of what is now the Congregational church of Webster township. He was a man possessing good natural abilities, and an indomitable will. He died of the heart disease Aug. 5, 1843, and was buried in the soil he purchased of the Government in 1828.

Munnis Kenny came from Massachusetts to Webster in 1829. (A biographical sketch of Mr. Kenny may be found elsewhere in this work.)

FIRST MARRIAGE, BIRTH AND DEATH.

Among the early settlers of Webster it must not be supposed were no young ladies to captivate the hearts of the young men who were striving to make habitable this new country. Among the early settlers of the town already mentioned was Ira Seymour, who was the father of several as handsome girls as any county could boast. One of these, Miss Ruth Seymour, in 1827 linked her fortunes with Samuel W. Foster, being the first couple married in the town.

Maria Alexander, now Mrs. Alonzo Gorton, was born June 5, 1827, and was the first white child born in this township. The first male child was John Augustus Boyden, born June 19, 1827.

The first called from Webster was the infant child of Mr. and Mrs. Salmon H. Matthews, who died Aug. 14, 1828.

SOIL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

The surface of the country is generally undulating. Boyden's plain, situated in the southeast part of the town, is about one mile in length, and about three-fourths of a mile in width. It is quite level. There are no high hills or large swamps in the town. The soil is variable. Boyden's Plain is a good burr-oak soil, generally gravelly loam. Clayey loam prevails generally throughout the southern and middle portions of the town, while in the northern, where more marsh land is found, there is considerable sandy land. The timber is also variable, being what is called timbered openings, with some exceptions. Southwest from Boyden's Plain is a belt of timbered land consisting of various kinds of oak, with some hickory and basswood. On the south side of sec. 27 and the north side of section 34 there is a belt of timber, consisting of oak, elm, ash, beach and maple. Black walnut is also found. One tree in particular deserves mention. It stood on the land located by John Williams. This tree was cut down and sawed into 12-foot logs by Salmon H. Matthews and Ezra Fish some time during the winter of 1827-28. They loaded one of the smallest of the logs on an ox-sled and drew it about 10 rods. There the sled broke and the log was abandoned. The others were not removed from the place where the tree fell for quite a while afterward. This tree was seven feet in diameter at the base. The body made eight logs, and is believed to be the largest tree ever found in Washtenaw county. Some of the branches made fair-sized saw-logs, being over two feet in diameter. This big black-walnut tree stood in a ravine through which runs a creek made by the rain and melting snows of spring. The formation of the ground at that spot is such that the sediment carried down by the water has covered the remaining limbs, and they are thereby kept in a state of preservation. The stump is still standing, but is much decayed. It has been visited by many persons, and is known as the "big black-walnut stump."

PRODUCTIONS.

The productions are wheat, corn, oats, barley, hay, wool and pork. Fruit of all varieties abounds. Apples are very abundant. Broom-corn has been cultivated to some extent at different times. Moses Kingsley and Henry Montague raised the first broom-corn in the town, on the farm of John Williams, in 1835. Sorghum also at one time received considerable attention.

POSTOFFICE.

Soon after the organization of the township the inconvenience of mail facilities became a subject of discussion, Dexter and Ann Arbor being from four to ten miles distant from many of the newcomers. An application numerously signed was addressed to the Postoffice Department at Washington, asking for the establishment of a post route and postoffice, and the appointment of a postmaster and mail carrier. The application was promptly responded to, and the appointment of postmaster was conferred upon Moses Kingsley, then residing a short distance east of the Presbyterian church of Webster. The commission was given during the second administration of Andrew Jackson, in 1834, Amos Kendall being Postmaster-General. Henry Montague and Chester W. Kingsley were the mail-carriers by turns; but often Moses Kingsley, with the mail on his back, made his weekly trips to Ann Arbor to carry and receive it, taking the key along with him and stopping to deliver it to Peter Sears, Mr. Barber and Luther Boyden. Stephen Stowell succeeded Mr. Kingsley in the postoffice. He lived with Spencer Williams, his son-in-law, and thence the office was removed. After keeping the office two years Mr. Stowell resigned in favor of J. D. Williams, whose commission bears date Feb. 1, 1839, and signed by Amos Kendall. Subsequently Charles Williams, John Williams, Spencer Williams, William Burnham and Morgan J. Spencer held the office in the order named. It is now held by William Lowe, who lives near Independence lake.

RIVERS AND LAKES.

The Huron river crosses the southwest corner of the township, cutting across the southwest corner of section 30, and cutting section 31 into nearly equal parts. It also runs through Base lake, which lies in section 6. Base lake is a little less than one mile in length, and three-fourths of a mile in width. The other lakes in Webster are Independence and three small lakes having no name on the maps, but known in the town as Park's, Scadin's and Dead lake. Park's lake is on the corners of sections 7, 8, 17 and 18; Scadin's lake is on the north part of section 26; Dead lake lies between sections 1 and 12. The largest lake is Independence. It is nearly circular in form, one-half on section 11 and the other half on section 12, and is not less than one mile in diameter. This lake has a history. Some time toward the close of the month of June, 1827, the few scattered and hard-working settlers took it into their matter-of-fact, patriotic and fun-loving heads to have a Fourth of July celebration. The lake was decided upon as the place of meeting. The day arrived and the people assembled, being full of patriotism, and armed with fishing tackle, cooking utensils, bread, butter, salt, pepper, and any and every thing that was thought could add to the enjoyment of the celebration of the day. Although they had no orator, none of the spread-eagle eloquence, none of the boast and braggadocio common to such occasions, yet they had a good time. The business in hand was fishing and being fished, cooking and being cooked, eating and being eaten (for you must know that while the fishermen had a bite in the water and in front, they got numerous bites in the rear), and while all was as "merry as a marriage bell," Luther Boyden proposed the name "Independence" for the lake, and so it was christened.

There are two small creeks in the town. One runs through the southeast corner and empties into the Huron river; the other in one of its branches heading in the east part of the town, and the other branch, leading from Independence lake, runs northwesterly and empties into Base lake.

THE BLACK HAWK WAR.

The spring of 1831 is memorable as the year of the "Black Hawk war." The Pottawatomies, a friendly tribe, were dispersed through the State, and often met the settlers for the purpose of traffic or begging for food and tobacco. Their presence alone was sufficient to connect them with a race that had been considered the enemy of the whites; and when the rumors and memories of war-like movements on the part of the Indians obtained credence among the scattered and defenseless population of Webster township, intense fear was the result. It was said that the squaws and papposes were being sent into Canada, while the fighting braves were massing by the thousands in close proximity to the settlements. Hurried consultations were had when neighbors met, and the latest rumors exchanged and intensified. A public meeting was called to convene at the house of John Williams, to devise means of defense, but came to no definite results. Mr. Cogswell, living in the north part of the township, and in the then outlying settlement, removed his household goods and family to the barn of Mr. Williams, where they remained until the excitement ceased. And so Mr. Williams' place was called the "fort." Many hopes and fears were entertained, and even jokes and repartee passed freely around.

Mr. Ranney, of Dexter, at that time a Corporal in the organized militia, took the responsibility, or had it conferred on him, of calling out the soldiers within his district. Hurrying from house to house on foot, he delivered his orders, accompanying them with all the latest and most exaggerated reports. His message was usually given to the females of the family, in the absence of the men at their work, with an instructive capacity that no report should suffer from the want of exaggeration, and he seemed to rejoice in his success as an alarmist. One instance of a pretty big scare is well remembered. Mr. Gardner Bird had that spring moved on to his new farm, erected his log house, and taken a few acres of land to work on the plains. He was three miles from home at work when Mr. Ranney called, relating his rumors of the intentions of the Indians, and their numbers and proximity to Mrs. Bird. The scared wife with her three children, two in her arms and the oldest on foot by her side clinging to her dress, started for her husband. Mr. Bird received the intelligence with many scruples—did not believe the danger so imminent, but could not resist the entreaties of his wife with her little ones, and they all returned to their endangered home, packing up their household goods for a speedy departure. The next morning they were loaded upon the only vehicle they possessed, with the family atop, and with an ox team they were at an early hour en route for their old home in "York State." They reached Ypsilanti that day, where they stopped for the night. But during the day's travel they discovered that the farther they traveled the less alarming the reports became. After a good night's rest and the assurance they received that the danger was not so imminent as it had appeared from Ranney's recital, they determined to retrace their steps. The next night found them once more at their new home, and still no Indians near.

But the militia, with hurried preparations and exchanging of good-byes with mothers, sisters, and sweethearts, made their rendezvous at Ann Arbor, according to military order. But here an unexpected difficulty met them: by what authority were they called here? Who should take charge of them? Such were the interrogatories passed from lip to lip, and still the question returned unanswered.

Gen. Brown, who was supposed to have some authority in the premises, failed to put in an appearance, and no military officer could show any authority for receiving or holding these brave men, who with such ebullitions of patriotism had taken up their arms in defense of those sacred homes which the untutored savage would so ruthlessly desolate. The day was passing away when by common consent the brave soldiers dispersed to their respective homes, cancelled their good-byes, and went to work in their respective corn-fields, thankful when the news reached them at a later day that Black Hawk and his braves had not been this side of Lake Michigan, and that the emigration of the squaws and papposes to Canada was a myth, and thus ended—so far as the town of Webster was a party to it—the scare of the Black Hawk war.

THE SMALL-POX SCARE.

There is one incident connected with Webster township which will be very interesting,—one dating back to the summer and fall of 1832. An emigrant, whose name was Roorabeck, bought the farm now owned by Edgar Cranson. He at once cut logs for a house, and invited the neighbors to help roll them up. The whole neighborhood promptly responded, as every new-comer was cordially welcomed, and every one was ready to help when their services were needed. While the log-raising was progressing a son of Mr. Roorabeck, a lad about nine years of age, came out from their tent and sat on a log near to where the men were at work, having what appeared to be an eruptive disease, and when some inquiry was made as to the cause, the family called it the chicken-pox; and so the subject was dropped, attracting little or no further attention. Some days after the boy became worse; a physician was called, who pronounced the disease small-pox. This news spread with great rapidity through the neighborhood. The fact that so many had been exposed on the day of the raising created great excitement. Measures were at once taken to prepare for the visitation of the loathsome disease, vaccination was used as a preventive measure, and in some cases inoculation was resorted to, and the system prepared by dieting for a mitigation of the disease. After the usual number of days for the development of the disease, quite a number of cases of unmistakable small-pox appeared. Of the number thus attacked three cases proved fatal, while many others barely escaped a fatal termination. When questioned about the malady the Roorabeck family said that on the boat coming up Lake Erie was an old woman of whom it was rumored that she had recently had the small-pox; but when the captain spoke to her about it she showed a physician's certificate that there was no danger of taking the disease from her.

This restored confidence and quiet on the boat. This scare was the talk for many days, and few of those who lived in the neighborhood will ever forget it.

SCHOOLS.

The early settlers made provision for the education of their children at as early a day as their circumstances and the sparseness of the settlement would permit. The first school-house was erected in 1830, on the south side of Boyden's plain. The first teacher who taught here was Miss Mary Ann Sears (afterward Mrs. Abram Moe), now deceased. Some of the subsequent teachers were Miss Nancy Parsons (afterward Mrs. Eman, and still later the wife of Prof. Nutting, who was principal of an academy in Lodi), Ezra Fish, Miss Jennie M. Cooley (afterward Mrs. P. H. Reeve) and Lewis D. Stowell. This school-house being for a long time the only one in the vicinity, accommodated a large district, some of the pupils living four miles away. The building served the double purpose of school-house and meeting-house for a number of years.

At present there are three whole and four fractional districts, as follows :

Fractional district No. 1 comprises sections 25, 36, and parts of 24, 26, 35. Its school-house is on section 35, and is a frame building, valued at $500. John W. Alexander, Director.

District No. 2 comprises section 27, and parts of sections 22, 23, 26, 34, 35. Its school-house, which is a frame building, is located on section 27, and is valued at $1,000. George W. Phelps, Director.

District No. 3 comprises section 29, and parts of sections 19, 20, 21, 28, 30, 32, 33. Its school-house is of brick, located on the corner of sections 20, 21, 28 and 29. It is valued at $300. Wooster Blodgett, Director.

District No. 5 comprises section 15, and parts of sections 10, 14, 16, 17, 20, 21, 22. Its school-house is on section 15, and is valued at $800. Frank H. Wheeler, Director.

Fractional district No. 6 comprises section 12, and parts of sections 11, 13, 14. Its school-house is on section 12, and is valued at $600. Thomas Kearney, Director.

Fractional district No. 7 comprises sections 1, 2, and parts of 3, 10, 11. Its school-house is located on section 2, and is a frame building, valued at $800. George W. Merrill, Director.

Fractional district No. 8 comprises sections 4, 5, 8, 9, and parts of 3, 6, 7, 10, 16, 17. Its school-house is on the southeast corner of section 5, and is valued at $500. James Walsh, Director.

MORAL AND RELIGIOUS.

The early settlers of Webster were a moral and religious people. No effort was spared to develop the moral faculties of all. When public religious services could not be held, to the closet went the God-fearing men and women, and offered up their prayers to God. During the winter of 1829-'30, the good people of the settlement began to see and feel the alarming effects of the free use of whisky, and began to hold temperance meetings. They organized a temperance society and adopted a pledge to abstain altogether from the use of whisky as a beverage. Luther Boyden entered heartily into this movement and did much toward the suppression of the vice of intemperance. In the month of January, 1830, Mr. Boyden commenced the erection of his first barn. He employed Horace Carpenter to put up the frame. The country was so sparsely settled that in order to get men enough to raise a good-sized barn, invitations must be extended to the distance of about 12 miles. It was an unheard of thing to attempt to raise a building without whisky, but Mr. Boyden determined to make the trial. When told that he would fail, his reply was, "Then fail it is." The 25th day of March was appointed as the day for the raising. The men were invited with the understanding that no whisky would be furnished, but in lieu thereof a good supper would be provided, of which all would be invited to partake after the frame was up. Although it was an innovation on an old established custom, it was a success. Mr. Boyden with his indomitable energy, and with the assistance of other temperance men, carried it through, and thus raised the first barn in Webster without whisky.

In speaking of the sacrifices made by the pioneers, in order that they might meet for religious services, Moses Kingsley thus writes: "It is unnecessary to speak of the poverty of the few who constituted the pioneers of the township—poverty, only as the term is applicable to the absence of ready money. Sturdy, rugged, earnest young and middle-aged men and women, with their fortunes and reputations to make, with but little besides what God and nature had furnished them, with a determined will they leveled the forest, upturned the sod, and cast in the seed, then watched and waited for its fruitage. While providing for the wants of the outer man, they felt the necessity for the moral and spiritual culture which their immigration to their new homes had in a great measure deprived them of. They cheerfully traveled on foot, or, if fortunate enough to have a team and cart or sled, would place these conveniences in requisition, and all the family would go miles to meeting, taking a lunch and spending the Sabbath in the rude log school-house, sitting upon the hard slab seats, quite in contrast with the fashionable modern church with its luxurious upholstered seats."

The first sermon preached in Webster was in the summer of 1827, by Rev. William Page, at the house of Salmon H. Matthews. Mr. Page at this time was ministering to the Presbyterian Church in Ann Arbor. An Episcopal clergyman preached a few times at the house of Thomas Alexander during the latter part of 1827. The first minister of the Methodist Episcopal denomination was Rev. Benjamin Cooper, who preached occasionally at the house of Charles Starks, during the fall of 1828. Revs. Leonard B. Gurley, Henry Colclazer and Elijah H. Pilcher were also early Methodist ministers. Rev. Charles G. Clark was the first and only resident minister in town for a period of nearly 19 years. Mr. Clark came to Webster Nov. 27, 1829, and preached his first sermon on the following Sabbath. Mr. Clark was a minister under appointment of the Home Missionary Society, and for several years received his support, in part, from that society. In January following he organized the Presbyterian Church of Dexter and preached every Sabbath in the vicinity. The next summer Mr. Clark went East and was gone some months, during which time Bible readings were held alternately at the house of John Williams and Munnis Kenny. On the return of Mr. Clark, he resumed preaching. In the winter of 1832-'33 a protracted meeting was held at the house of John Williams, resulting in the conversion of a number of persons. Those connected with the Church, living in Webster, soon after petitioned the Church at Dexter for letters of dismission, which was granted, and the Webster Presbyterian Church was formed on the 27th of Jan., 1834. In December, 1834, a call was made to Rev. C. G. Clark to become its regular pastor, which call was accepted. Mr. Clark continued in this relation until 1848.

In 1833 an attempt was made to erect a house of worship. Pledges were obtained to the amount of about $500, much of it being in material or work. In the spring of 1834 the frame was erected, but this exhausted the finances of the building committee. Moses Kingsley was now sent East to solicit funds for its completion. He secured $160, which enabled the committee to enclose the house, and with further help obtained at home, it was painted and temporarily seated. The year following the house was plastered and better seats furnished. This church edifice is probably the oldest in the county.

The government of this Church remained Presbyterian until 1860, when it was changed to Congregational.

The Church has enjoyed the ministerial services of Revs. Charles G. Clark, C. Galpin, D. B. Davidson, Norman Tucker, Thomas Wright, John B. Fisk, Mr. Gelsten, Joseph Estabrook, Lucius D. Chapin, David Taylor, William Campbell, George Jackson, H. E. Brown, Prof. Tyler, B. F. Parsons, Prof. D'Ooge and William C. Allen. The following named served as Elders under Presbyterian form of government: Jacob Drenns, David Dwight, Munnis Kenny, Moses Kingsley, Moses M. Boynton, Austin Anderson, Theodore Foster, P. H. Reeve, Norman Dwight, Sturms Kimberly. On its change to Congregational, Philip H. Reeve and Norman C. Goodale were elected Deacons, and W. R. Waldron, Clerk. Norman C. Goodale died July 8, 1869, and Edwin Blodgett was elected March 31, 1871. Russell C. Reeve was also elected at the same time. In 1873 Norman Dwight was elected Deacon.

The Methodist Episcopal brethren organized a class in 1830 and maintained its organization until 1843, meeting at first in private dwellings and subsequently in school-houses, when a schism occurred, resulting in the dismemberment of the organization. The members united in neighboring Churches. In 1862 a young student in the University, Rev. Mr. Vandozer, proceeded to gather together the scattered and almost latent Methodist element. A series of meetings were held, a new organization effected, and a church edifice erected about a mile and a quarter north of the Congregational church.

BIOGRAPHICAL.

Edward L. Alexander, farmer and stock-raiser, sec. 35, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; is a son of Thomas and Maria (Warren) Alexander, the former a native of Wales, and the latter of Ireland. The former died in 1870 at the age of 85, and the latter in 1868, being 69 years old. They immigrated to Washtenaw county in 1826. The subject of this sketch was born in this county, March 1, 1845. He was raised a farmer's boy, and has followed that occupation all his life, at present being in partnership with his brother. He was married in Upper Canada, in 1866, to Sarah M. —, a native of Canada, where she was born Sept. 24, 1848. They have 2 children—Horace E., born Sept. 12, 1872, and William E. F., born Nov. 17, 1877. Mr. A. is an enterprising and successful farmer, and a man well respected in the community in which he resides. Politically he is a Republican.

John Alexander, farmer, sec. 25, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; was born in Washtenaw county in 1831, and is a son of Thomas and Hannah M. (Warren) Alexander, the former of Welsh and the latter of Irish descent. They came to this county in 1826, being among the first to settle in Webster tp. He was married in Dundee, Canada, in 1867, to Emily Kitchen, born in West Canada, Jan. 25, 1843, and daughter of Isaac and Catherine (Schran) Kitchen. This union was blessed with 3 children—William W., born Dec. 24, 1867; George E., born Dec. 3, 1869; and Marshall M., born Nov. 21, 1872. At the age of 17 Mr. Alexander commenced to buy and sell stock, which business, in connection with farming, he has followed the greater part of his life. For three years he was a contractor on the building of a large railroad through Ohio. He also was engaged in the lumber trade, in St. Clair Co., Mich., for a short time. He has held several local offices, and at present is a member of the Masonic fraternity. In religion, Mr. Alexander is a Liberal, and in politics a Republican.

M. H. Alexander, farmer, sec. 26, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; was born in Webster tp. Sept. 5, 1829, and is at present the oldest living native of that township. He is a son of Thomas and Maria Alexander, the former a native of Wales, and the latter of Irish nativity. They emigrated to the county in 1826, and were among the fearless band of pioneers who first entered Webster tp. Mr. A. was married in 1855, to Sarah E. Appleton, a native of Livingston Co., Mich., and probably the first white child born in that county. The fruit of this union is one child—Arthur L., born in 1856, and at present a very successful teacher. He bids fair to rank high in the profession of which he is an honored member. He is connected with the Masonic fraternity. Mr. A.'s father can tell many an interesting story of pioneer life, and the trials and tribulations of the early settlers in Webster tp. Mr. Alexander and his wife are connected with the Liberals or Free Thinkers, and are much respected in the neighborhood. He is a Republican. He owns a good farm of 40 acres.

Robert M. Alexander, farmer, sec. 25, Webster tp.; P. O., Delhi Mills; is the son of Thomas and Maria (Warren) Alexander, and a brother of the foregoing. Mr. Alexander and Luther Boyden came to this county about the same time. Together they went out one day to examine the soil and Mr. Boyden was rather suspicious of it, thinking it was not of the best quality of farm land, but Mr. A. took a spade, and digging up a quantity of it, examined it carefully and pronounced it good. They then drew cuts to see who should have first choice of the land lying on the east and west side of the road. Mr. B. was favored by fortune and drew first choice. They then made a solemn vow never to infringe on the rights of the other; i. e., Mr. B. was never to touch any land on the east side of the road and Mr. A. on the west side, and the vow has been faithfully adhered to through life. Mr. A. was twice married—in 1854, in Jackson county, to Clara Baker, a native of New York, where she was born in 1833. They had 3 children—Estella (wife of Mr. Rosier, of this county), Clay W. and Clara. The mother passed from earth in 1869. The second marriage was in 1870, to Fanny Howell, a native of Canada, and born in 1846. They were blessed with one child—Lillie. Mr. A. is a Republican.

James Bowdoin Arms was born in South Deerfield, Mass., in 1801, and his wife, Clarissa, in Palmer, Mass., in 1802. He bought 200 acres of land on secs. 4 and 9, this tp., and emigrated here with his family in May, 1834; rented a 7x9 log house of Russell Cooley, which he occupied until late the next fall; contracted with a man to build a small frame house for him this season, but after getting the timber almost ready to raise, he got to drinking and ran away. Directly after arriving here Mr. Arms bought two yoke of oxen and two cows, of the late Henry Warner; was then out of money and had to grub for awhile; obtained credit, and bought his year's stock of wheat at five shillings per bushel; lived comfortably for awhile; lumber being scarce, he used blankets for doors. Having only loose boards for a chamber floor, an almost fatal accident happened one night. Mrs. Arms was up stairs on her way to bed with her child, when a board tipped, and down went the child to the floor below, and Mrs. A. would have fallen through with it had not her husband, who was far more spry then than now, grasped her. No bones were broken.

It being rumored one day that a bear was roaming in the neighborhood, and several panthers in pursuit of him, Mr. Arms seized his gun, started in hot pursuit through a marshy country, and soon came in sight of Bruin, who soon disappeared in the woods near by. Although it was near night, Mr. A. followed into the woods until he obtained sight of him again, but becoming discouraged in the chase, he gave it up, and undertook to fire off his gun to encourage the party he had left some distance behind; but after snapping the trigger two or three times in vain, he started home. On his way he examined his gun and found that in his haste in loading he had got the ball below the powder!

Deer were plentiful. One day Mr. A. saw a dozen in one drove, but unfortunately he had no gun with him. Wild turkeys were also abundant—sometimes in flocks so large that they could not be counted, except by the acre. Mr. Arms once saw as many as 40 acres covered by one flock!

Some of the early neighbors of the subject of this sketch were M. Kenny, Luther Boyden, Wm. Lotran, Elisha Cranson, John Williams, Jacob Blanden, Silas Cogswell, Benjamin Reed, Hiram Reed, Jesse Cushing, Peter Sears, Charles Stark and Russell Cooley. The last mentioned, a Massachusetts man who located here in 1831, was one of the best of neighbors, contributing much to the comfort of Mr. Arms' family while they were becoming acclimated by fever and ague, etc. He died about 30 years ago. His eldest daughter is the widow of the late Deacon T. H. Reeve, and is a very estimable woman. Mr. Cooley's youngest daughter, now Mrs. Averill Burnett, resides on the old homestead.

When Mr. Arms first arrived in this neighborhood, he found a Presbyterian Church already organized, with Rev. Mr. Clark as pastor, who, with the aid of a farm of his own, managed to get along, as the Church was small and poor. The method of attending church then was by means of lumber wagons, drawn by oxen. Several families would often pile into one wagon, and two yoke of oxen would be necessary for locomotive power. They always remembered to take their dinner along with them, as they would have two sermons a day, and eat their dinner and have a social chat between the two hours of service. This was the substitute for newspapers. One Sunday, during the Mexican war, at the close of morning service, a good old gentleman asked, as he descended the church steps, "Do you think this Mexican war will have any effect upon the price of wheat?"

Mr. Arms' portrait is given in this volume.

Edwin Ball, farmer, sec. 22, Webster tp.; P. They came to this county in 1832, and settled in Webster tp. on sec. 22, where Mr. Ball died Dec. 19, 1867, but the mother still lives there with her son Edwin, having seen many changes in this beautiful country. The subject of this sketch was born on the old homestead, in 1844. He was married in Livingston Co., Mich., to Olive Bertustle, a native of this county, where she was born in 1847. She died in 1876. He was married again to Fanny Jones, a native of Livingston county, having been born there in 1858. They have 1 child—May P., born Feb., 1880. Mr. B. owns 22 acres of excellent farm land.

Mr. B., Sr., came to this county in 1835, where he remained until his death, which occurred in 1877; the widow is still living, at the age of 73. The subject of our sketch was married in 1858 to Mary A. Haight, daughter of William and Sarah (Galloway) Haight, two of the old and honored pioneers of the county, having emigrated here in 1835, and a native of this county, having been born here in 1837. They have no children. Mr. Ball has been honored five times with the office of Supervisor of Webster tp. He has made a specialty of raising blooded cattle, and has a very fine herd of them. In politics votes with the Republican party.

Samuel H. Ball (deceased) was one of the early pioneers of Washtenaw county. He was the son of Deacon James Ball, and was born in the State of Vermont, April 9, 1804. In 1806 he moved with his parents to Sempronius, Cayuga Co., N. Y. In 1828 he was married to Olive Seeley, from which alliance 8 children have been born, 3 boys and 2 girls, 5 of whom are living. He moved with his family to Michigan in 1835, and settled on 80 acres of land in sec. 5, Webster tp., and by perseverance, economy and industry has succeeded in extending the limits of the 80-acre farm until it contains 300 acres of cultivated land within its borders. He was respected and honored by his fellow-townsmen and was called upon to fill the office of Supervisor and Justice of Peace, which he did to the satisfaction of all. He passed away from earth on Aug. 17, 1877, after having felt the frosts of 93 years fall upon his manly head.

Charles Bleicher, farmer, sec. 22, Webster tp., P. O., Dexter; was born in Germany, in 1826. He emigrated with his parents to America in 1844, and settled in Washtenaw county, the same year, where the former lived until their death. Mr. Bleicher was married in 1850 to Ann Burkhardt, who was born in Germany, in 1830. Seven children were sent to bless this union, 4 of whom still survive—Charles W., Frederick M., John C. and Anna S. Mrs. Bleicher's parents came to this county in 1836; and therefore experienced a few of the "trials and tribulations" incident to pioneer life. Mr. B. owns 132 acres of choice farm land, and himself and wife are consistent members of the Lutheran Church.

Worcester Blodgett is a wealthy farmer and stock-raiser of Webster tp., owning 384 acres on sec. 28, valued at $70 per acre. He is the son of Luke and Mary A. (Anderson) Blodgett, both natives of England. They immigrated to this county in 1836, and settled where the subject of this sketch now resides, where they lived till death overtook them; the former died in 1879, and the latter in 1877. Mr. Blodgett, Sr., was an earnest advocate of the abolition of slavery, and lived to see it accomplished; he was also a worthy member of the Dexter Temperance Society, or Reform Club, and when his death occurred, a resolution eulogizing him was passed by the members. He was an old pioneer and beloved by all who knew him. Worcester was born in New York, Nov. 11, 1831, and raised a farmer's boy. He has been successfully engaged in farming and stock-raising the greater part of his life. In 1879 he was married to Francelia Blodgett, whose maiden name was Derby, and a native of this county, having been born here in 1838. She has 1 child, May L., by her first husband. Mr. B. is a Republican.

Edward L. Boyden (deceased) was a prominent and successful farmer of Webster tp. He was the son of Luther and Theodosia (Bond) Boyden, both natives of Mass., and early settlers of this county, having come here in 1826, and settled on sec. 2, where they remained till death called them from their earthly home; the former dying in 1879, at the advanced age of 91, and the latter in 1863, at the age of 73. Mr. B. was married Feb. 8, 1854, to Frances A. Burnett, daughter of William and Helen (Smith) Burnett, both natives of New York, and where Frances was born Nov. 6, 1833. They were blessed with 3 children—Helen F., wife of Austin Kimberly, of Livingston county; they have 1 child—Harriet E., wife of Otis W. Cushing of — tp.; they have 2 children; William E. is the youngest child, and resides on the old homestead with his mother, superintending the farm of 600 acres, and raising short-horn cattle, of which he makes a specialty; and the barns and sheds for their comfort and use cost over $15,000. A fine brick residence adorns this large and well-cultivated farm. These buildings are insured for $23,000. Mr. Boyden was one of the most enterprising and progressive men in the county, and his son bids fair to become a worthy successor. Mr. B. had but one brother, a Colonel of the 10th Mich. Vol. Inf., and who lost his life in 1864, leaving a widow and two children to battle with the world alone. Mr. B. died Oct. 17, 1880, at the age of 49 years, and left behind him a record for honesty and uprightness rarely excelled by any man.

Luther Boyden was the first to do away with the use of liquor at barn raisings, supplying a good supper in its place. After the first bent was in place he mounted it and told them that no liquor would be given, even if the barn remained there until it rotted; that same barn was the temple in which the connubial knot was tied between Abram Moe and a Miss Miriam Sears; also was the church for that community for a long time. Mr. Boyden was a successful business man, and at his death, left an estate of 400 acres, and all under a high state of cultivation. In his farm life he was very neat and tasty, and probably had better facilities for carrying on farming than any man in this county. He was a liberal supporter of religious and educational matters, and rendered valuable assistance in the social and material improvements of Webster tp.

Hon. William Burnett (deceased) was born in Ontario Co., N. Y., in 1806, and was the son of Gen. William and Apamsia (Granger) Burnett, of Phelps, Ontario Co., N. Y. His mother was the daughter of Gen. Granger, of Revolutionary fame. In 1828 he was married to Helen, daughter of Fawnia Cole, widow of Gen. Philetus Swift (dec). In 1835 he brought his family, consisting of a wife and two children, to Michigan, where he lived up to the time of his death, honored and respected by all who knew him. In the various offices of honor and trust conferred on him by his friends and constituents from Supervisor to member of the Legislature, he earned a reputation worthy of desire and remembrance. At the time of his death, he was Treasurer of the Washtenaw County Agricultural and Horticultural Society, and that body appointed a committee of three to pass resolutions in regard to the death of their worthy and efficient officer. None knew him but to admire his integrity, his love of truth and justice, and his desire to do his whole duty to his constituents, his country, and his God. But in his domestic and church relations more particularly, he earned a fame and memory worthy of being written out in imperishable lines in the heart's dearest memories. He died Oct. 8, 1856, aged 50 years. One son, Henry S. Burnett, a young man of estimable character, was raised upon his father's farm, and afterward studied civil engineering under Gen. Van Cleve, which profession he followed until about the time of his father's death, when he returned to this county and resumed control of the old homestead. A few years after he entered into the hardware business in Shiawassee Co., Mich., remaining there until the breaking out of the Rebellion, when he raised a company of men, and was elected Captain. They tendered their services to Gov. Blair, who assigned them as Co. A, 10th Reg. Mich. Vol. Inf., where they served with distinction through all the hard-fought battles and tedious marches. Capt. Burnett was promoted Major of the Regiment, to rank from Dec. 29, 1863. In the battles near Atlanta, Georgia, the 10th Mich. was detailed to cut off the railroad communications at Jonesboro, and to prevent the confederates from receiving supplies. Major Burnett was put in command of the detailed force, and was attacked by a large number of the enemy. The brave boys of the North led by Major Burnett made a gallant charge on the rebels, but in the thickest of the fight their noble commander fell a victim to the enemy's wrath, and they were obliged to retreat. Major Burnett was undoubtedly one of the bravest soldiers in the U. S. service, and deserves to be commemorated in the hearts of the many whose cause he so gallantly espoused. Frances A. Burnett, the second child of Hon. William Burnett, was educated in the Ann Arbor schools, and was married to Edwin L. Boyden, one of the most prominent farmers of Washtenaw county.

Mr. Lee's father died in 1878, but his stepmother, who came to this section of the country in 1830, is still living with him. could be bought for a mere song. Mr. L. is a well-respected and honored citizen of the county. He is a Republican, and the owner of 190 acres of valuable land.

He came to Washtenaw county in 1856, and was married to Susan Hubbard. They have 3 children—Calvin, Hattie and Jay. Mr. L. rented the Peninsula Mills, in Dexter, some time ago, and has been operating it successfully since.

Hon. Morgan O'Brien (deceased) was a native of Ireland, where he was born in 1814. His parents, Cornelius and Mary O'Brien, emigrated with Morgan to America, and believing that Washtenaw county offered inducements in soil, climate, and locality superior to any part of the United States they had formerly seen, they located in this fertile and healthful region, where they resided until death called them away. Among pioneer associates and pioneer scenes, young Morgan took his first lessons in the practical part of life. He worked on his father's farm, and acquired a love for agricultural pursuits, which grew stronger as each succeeding year came and went, and never ceased until the soul had fled from this earthly form, and he was laid at rest in the silent tomb. In 1845 he united his fortunes with those of Mary T. Nanry, she, too, being a native of Ireland, where she was born in 1812. As time fled swiftly along, it brought 2 children to this happy and peaceful couple, and they were named Ellie M. and Anastatia, now the wife of Timothy Fohey, of this county. Mr. O'Brien became a prominent farmer of Washtenaw county, and in 1850 was nominated by the Democratic Convention as a member of the Michigan House of Representatives. He was elected, and became a member of what was familiarly called the "Constitutional Convention," and right well and honorably did he serve his constituents in this county. He served one term, and in that short time gained such a knowledge of State affairs as to enable him in after years to be able to see the why and wherefore of the acts that were passed and the bills that were offered, better than many men who had been elected for several years in succession. When he came to Washtenaw county he had but little capital, but with a strong arm and a brave heart he went resolutely to work to make for himself and family a home, and in the years that followed he prospered exceedingly, so at the time of his death he left a farm of 220 acres of choice land, which is now occupied by his two daughters. The date of his departure from this earth was June 1, 1876, and in his death the wife lost a kind husband, the daughters a loving father, and the neighbors and friends a warm-hearted and sympathetic neighbor and counselor. His wife did not survive him long, and when the leaves began to drop in the autumn, she too began to decline, and in the month of October she followed him to the place where the dead shall rest till the "angel of God shall stand with one foot on land, and one on sea, and swear that time shall be no more."

Henry Warren, farmer, sec. 33, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; was born in New York, in 1824. His parents were Thomas and Elizabeth Warren, the former born in Somersetshire, Eng., in 1789, and emigrated to America in 1816; to Michigan in 1835, and settled on sec. 33, Webster tp., in June, 1855. His mother was of Scotch ancestry. Mr. W. was but 11 years of age when he arrived in the county, and he was sent to school during the winter months, and worked on a farm in summer till old enough to battle for himself. He was married in Ontario Co., N. Y., in 1859, to Elizabeth Schneider, daughter of John and Mary (Varnortztall) Schneider. She was a native of New York, and born there in 1833. They had 8 children born to them, 7 of whom are living—Thomas J., Willard M., Frederick E., Henry F., Cora E., Edith A. and Austin L. One son, Austin, is deceased. Mr. Warren is connected with the Democratic party. He owns 370 acres of land, valued at $70 per acre.

William H. Weston, farmer, sec. 22, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; is a native of New York, and born March 22, 1836. He is the son of Jacob and Martha (Moriela) Weston, the former of Massachusetts nativity, and the latter of New York. They immigrated to this county in 1836, where Mr. Weston, sr., departed this life in 1855; the latter is still living, at the advanced age of 75. In 1862 Mr. W. enlisted in Co. F, 6th Mich. Vol. Cav., and served three years in that memorable rebellion, participating in the battles of Gettysburg, Malvern Hill, and at all the engagements in which the 6th was present. He was mustered out of service at fort Leavenworth, and came to Washenaw county, where he was married in 1868 to Sarah Bostwick, daughter of Simon and Phœbe Bostwick, and a native of this county, where she was born in 1848. This alliance has been blessed with 1 child, Melvina, born in 1868. Politically he is a Republican. He has filled several local offices.

John C. Wheeler, farmer, sec. 15, Webster tp.; is a native of New Hampshire, and born there in 1824. His parents were Tillotson and Polly (Campbell) Wheeler, who immigrated to this county in 1830, where the former died in 1862. His mother is still living at the advanced age of 92. Mr. W. came to this county with his parents, and in 1849 was married to Mary, daughter of William and Hannah Harrison, both natives of England, where Mary was born in 1830. This union has been blessed with 5 children—Stearns T., Jean, Oral, Frank and Sam. Mr. Wheeler has held several tp. offices, and in politics is a Republican. He owns 270 acres of excellent farm land, valued at $65 per acre.

Harmon Williams, farmer, sec. 20, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; was born in New York in 1817. He is the son of Peter and Sarah (Tuthill) Williams, both natives of New York, who came to this county in 1831. The subject of this sketch was twice married—first to Emily Hudson, a native of New York, where she was born in 1827. By this union they had 3 children born to them—Isola D., now the wife of Gregory Peatt, of Nebraska; Harriet, wife of John Stanton, of this county; and Gregory H. The mother of these children died in 1874. In the State of Wisconsin, in 1876, he was married to Catherine Wightman, of New York nativity, where she was born in 1831, daughter of William and Elizabeth Wightman, old settlers of this county. He is a member of the Congregational Church, and Mrs. W. of the Episcopal Church. Politically he adheres to the Republican administration.

Osbert Williams, farmer and stock-raiser, sec. 27, Webster tp.; P. O., Dexter; was born in this county Nov. 21, 1831. His parents were Spencer and Maria D. Williams, the former a native of New York, and the latter of Vermont. They emigrated to this county in 1828, being among the first settlers within the borders of Washtenaw. They settled on sec. 27, and remained there till they were called away from this earthly home, both dying in 1868. Osbert was raised on the farm, and has been living on a farm all his life. He was married in Livingston Co., Mich., in 1866, to Sarah E. Cook, daughter of Thomas and Elizabeth Cook, and a native of England, where she was born July 16, 1843. They have 6 children by this marriage—Ralph, Maria E., Osbert, Frank, Spencer (deceased) and Ida (deceased). Mr. Williams has been very successful in a financial way, and now owns 200 acres of good cultivated land, valued at $80 per acre.

DEXTER TOWNSHIP.

The town of Dexter was one of the three towns into which the county was originally organized, and comprised townships one and two south, in range five east of the base line, and townships one and two in said range, north of base line, and all the remaining townships north and south of the base line, in ranges one, two, three and four. It was named in honor of Samuel W. Dexter, the first county judge of Washtenaw county.

The first town meeting was held at the house of Mr. Dexter, May 28, 1827, at which officers were chosen for the town for one year. The following named were elected: Rufus Crossman, Supervisor; Nathan Noble, Clerk; Israel Arms, Henry Warner, Richard C. Dillon, Commissioners of Highways; Samuel Clemens, Luther Boyden, Jerome Loomis, George W. Peters, Assessors; Alexander Laverty, Collector, and Constable; Sylvanus Noble, Joseph Arnold, Overseers of the Poor; Cornelius Osterhout, Silas Kingsley, Russell Parker, Samuel W. Dexter, Israel Arms, Samuel Clemens, Richard C. Dillon, George W. Peters, Fence Viewers; Palmer Force, Luther Boyden, James Popkins, Pound Masters.

In 1836 the present township was organized, with Thomas Lee as Supervisor and Amos Gray as Clerk.

The first settlement of the town was made in 1825, on the north-east fractional quarter of sec. 36, by Sylvanus and Nathaniel Noble, who had settled in Ann Arbor the year previous. The next inhabitants were Joseph Arnold, Rufus Crossman and Henry Warner, each of whom located his land in the early part of the year 1826, made some improvements, and removed their families there in the fall of the same year. The names of those who came into the town within the next two years were C. S. Goodrich, Cornelius Osterhout, David Dudley, Richard Brower, Charles B. Taylor, Levi Whitcomb, Thomas Lee, Isaiah Phelps, Rogers Carr and his sons Enos N. Carr and Elijah P. Carr, Sidney S. Derby and Clark Perry. But one or two yet remain to witness the great changes that have been wrought. Garadus Noble, Adrian Quackenbush, Ephraim Carpenter, George H. Sherman, Isaac Pennoyer, Richard Peterson, John G. Peterson, Warren Spaulding, John Bruen, Samuel Northam, James M. LaRue, Patrick Hubbard, Daniel Tuttle and Eben Phelps became residents of the town prior to 1833, none of whom are left in the town.

Cornelius Osterhout and a man named Hull built a saw-mill on the site of the present Hudson Mills, in 1827. Judge Dexter and Isaac Pomeroy built a saw-mill on the site of the present Dover mills, in 1832. Dover Mills were built by Daniel B. Sloan & Co., in 1846, and remained in their hands until the death of Col. Sloan, in 1861, when on the settlement of his estate it was purchased by Thomas Birkett. Hudson Mills were built in 1844 by Adams & Peters. Adams' interest was soon after purchased by S. W. Holmes. After several changes in proprietorship, the property passed into the hands of Thomas Birkett, of the Dover Mills.

NORTH LAKE M. E. CHURCH was organized in 1836 with Rev. Chas. Glenn as class-leader, and a membership of 19, viz: Mary A. Glenn, John Glenn, Jane Glenn, Isaac Glenn, Aaron Vedder, Catharine Vedder, Elijah Brown, Clarissa Brown, John Moore, John Done, Ann Done, Sarah Searls, Benjamin H. Glenn, James E. Crane, James H. Brown, Ann Johnson and leader Joseph Whitcomb. The society met and held services at the house of John Glenn until about the year 1846, when Messrs. Charles and John Glenn, brothers, built at their own expense a small one-story frame building 20x26, the use of which was given to the public for school and church purposes, and used as such until the year 1866, when the new church was built. The present church edifice, a commodious frame structure 28x40 feet, 14-foot posts, has a spire, is painted white, furnished with comfortable sittings for about 150, has green outside blinds, and is a credit to the society and community at North Lake. The present Church membership is 70. They have preaching every Sabbath, Rev. J. W. Clark, Pastor; also Sunday-school, R. S. Whalian, Supt.

EBENEZER CHURCH.

This Church was organized February, 1871, electing D. Heinenger, J. G. Miller and G. Baus as trustees. This society had an existence as far back as 1866, services being held from house to house, and frequently in district school-houses, under the title of the Evangelical Association, very similar in form of government to that of the M. E. Church, and the position of pastor was filled at times from the M. E. Conference. In 1871 they reorganized, built a church edifice 38x24, at an expense of $1,130, which was dedicated Nov. 19, 1871, by Rev. W. Yost, of Cleveland, Ohio. The society is out of debt, has services every Sabbath and a Sunday-school, with full attendance.

There was a Catholic church located on the northeast corner of section 21. It was commenced about 1840, and completed about 1846; size, 26x36; Father Cullen was the first priest. There was no Catholic church between Ann Arbor and Jackson. The church flourished until 1854, when the building burnt. It was the intention to rebuild, but after some delay it was thought best to rebuild in Dexter village, and the fine Catholic church in that place is the one. Among the leading members were John McGuerrin, John Harrington, of Ryndon, Michael McCabe, Timothy Sullivan, John Doody, John Patrick, Michael Rabbitt, Patrick, Michael and James Lavey, and James McMahan.

The Episcopals organized a Church about 1834 or '35. Meetings were held in a log school-house on sec. 19, at a point known as North Lake Corners. An effort was made to erect a church building, but it was never completed. Here, one summer, a school was held by Elizabeth Phelps. Mr. Hay Stevenson's family was about the only family there. Dr. Gray, from Dexter, occasionally visited the neighborhood and held services.

PHYSICAL FEATURES.

The face of the land in the township is rolling, and in the northern and northwestern portions quite broken, interspersed very plentifully with lakes, marshes and tamarack swamps.

The first inhabitants of the town were principally from the State of New York, though some of them had emigrated to that State from the New England States. The later acquisitions to the population of the town have been largely of foreign birth or their descendants, those from Ireland largely predominating. The first Irishman who settled in the town was Patrick Curtin in 1834, followed in the next three years by Patrick Lavey, Michael Lavey, Joseph Murphy, John McGuinness, Michael McCabe, James Brogan, Michael Caffery, John Costin, Morris Dwyer, John McKernan, Nicholas Doody, Thomas Dolan, John Dolan, James Ryan, Edward Ryan, Richard Walsh, Joseph Walsh and perhaps others, until at the present time it is believed a majority of the citizens can claim their descent from the Emerald Isle. There are several German families, but, with two or three exceptions, they have become residents within the last 10 years. Both Irish and Germans become citizens and voters as soon as time and the necessary formalities required by law will permit. The primitive dwellings in the town were generally built of logs, and there are probably nearly 20 occupied as such, several of which have been continuously resided in for more than 40 years.

A few of the inhabitants still reside on the farms originally purchased by them from the Government; among them may be mentioned Thomas Dolan, Patrick Walsh, and James Ryan. Of those whose children own the lands which they located may be mentioned Isaiah Phelps, Peleg Johnson, Jacob Wilsey, Hay Stevenson, John Glenn, Andrew Smith, Ephraim Carpenter and Edward Ryan.

Eight school-houses are in this township, all of which are frame buildings. The first three built in town were located near the sites of the present houses in districts number one, two and three. Several of the earliest were built of logs.

Base Lake postoffice was established at Dover 25 or 28 years ago; it is on the mail route from Dexter to Howell and has a daily mail. The office has been sometimes at Dover and sometimes at Hudson. It is now at Dover. A postoffice was established at North Lake in 1834 or 1835, and another called Sterling on section 28 soon after. Both were discontinued a few years later. A tri-weekly mail is now carried through on the same route from Chelsea to Dansville, Ingham county.

There are more than 20 lakes of different sizes in the township. The principal of these are Portage, Silver, Half-Moon, North lake, West lake, and Four-Mile lake. The Portage, which, by the way, is one of the finest lakes in this country of beautiful lakes, occupies nearly the whole of section 1, a small portion of section 2; and as much or more territory in Livingston county; and is about two miles in length and one mile in width, with but little marsh surrounding it, except on the south and southwest. The Little Portage adjoins the Portage on the southwest, and is rather more than one-half of a mile in length and one-fourth of a mile wide. Silver lake lies on the west part of section three and the east part of section four, and contains probably 400 or 500 acres. Its outlet enters the Little Portage. Half-Moon lake occupies the greater part of section 6, and also projects into the town of Lyndon on the west and the town of Putnam on the north. North lake lies principally on section 18, extending a little into section 17 on the northeast, and into the town of Lyndon on the southwest. It is a little more than one mile in length and about one-half mile in breadth. This is another of the beautiful lakes of the country, the shores being generally bold, with but little waste land surrounding it in any part. West lake is a shallow body of water in the central part of section 30; the shores are bold except on the west and southwest, in which direction a worthless marsh extends some distance. It probably contains about 200 acres. North lake and West lake furnish no outlets except in times of high water. Four mile lake lies principally in Lima, but projects about one-fourth of a mile into section 33 in Dexter; it is about one mile long and rather more than one-half of a mile wide. The eastern shore is bold, but on the north and west are extensive marshes, some improvement of which has been attempted by lowering the lake and ditching the marshes; some portions have been benefited; in others the benefit is somewhat doubtful. The outlet is one of the head branches of Mill creek. The other lakes in the town are small, containing from one to 30 or 40 acres each. They are all stocked with fish, the principal being pickerel, bass, perch, mullet, bull-heads and sunfish. The supply of fish in the lakes, and also in the streams, is very much less than at the first settlement of the country. We have no recorded village plat of the township, but little hamlets have grown up around the Dover and Hudson mills. Not much business, however, has ever been done at either place, aside from that directly connected with the mills.

The soil of the upland in the southern central portions of the town is good wheat and corn land, composed of clay, sand and gravelly loam in varying proportions, with a considerable admixture of lime. The leading crop has been wheat, for which the land seems well adapted; corn, barley, oats, grass, and clover are produced to some extent on almost every farm. In the northern part of the town sand predominates more largely, some portions, especially on sections 5, 6, 7 and 8, being very sandy and not very productive. Apples have succeeded well in all parts of the town, and much pains has been taken by many farmers to obtain and cultivate good varieties. Peaches have not succeeded very well except in occasional seasons, on account of severe winters and late spring frosts; the more elevated localities and those protected by large bodies of water usually yielding the best results. Other fruits are not cultivated to any very great extent. A few farms in the vicinity of North lake have succeeded in producing the best and greatest variety of fruit of any part of the township. The marshes have been a great help to the early settlers in furnishing hay for feeding stock in winter, and some of them, especially near the running streams, still afford a good supply of hay of a better quality than that made from natural grasses; while other portions away from the running streams have deteriorated to such a degree that there is not much dependence on them for hay, though still furnishing considerable pasture. The timber on the upland was principally white and yellow oak and hickory with some burr-oak, poplar, sassafras and soft maple. In the swales, in addition to the above, were found occasionally white-wood, cottonwood, basswood, red and white elm, white and black ash, black walnut, sugar maple, and red and swamp oak.

By some blunder in surveying the township, the northern tier of sections contains less than three quarters of the prescribed quota of land, and the western tier of sections also falls short something like from 50 to 65 acres per section. The Huron river enters the township on the east side of section 1, running southerly across secs. 12, 13 and 24, and finally leaves the town on the east side of sec. 25. It furnishes two good water-powers, which are occupied by the Dover and Hudson flouring mills. The Portage branch, or as our map-makers have recently christened it, Turtle creek, runs through Half-Moon lake on section 6, then, passing north of the base line, it re-enters the town near the northwest corner of section 2, and empties into Little Portage lake on the southeast quarter of that section, thence through Portage lake into the Huron river near the east side of section 1. The other streams are small, and run toward Huron river, Turtle creek, and Mill creek.

The south end of Portage lake, on section 12, is noted as being the site of the celebrated city platted and lithographed by the eccentric G. R. Lillibridge, and called "Saratoga of Michigan." The beautiful lake in front, the lofty eminence called Prospect Hill in the rear, and a small spring near by, which tasted of iron and perhaps of some other minerals, were magnified by him into great attractions. A steamboat (on paper) for pleasure parties was launched on the lake, and could navigate through Portage, Base and Strawberry lakes making a round trip of 30 or 40 miles through the most romantic and delightful scenery ever seen in this or any other country. An observatory (also on paper) had been erected on Prospect Hill, affording a grand view over an extensive and beautiful tract of country dotted with villages, mills, and the residences of wealthy farmers. These attractions and the curative properties of the mineral spring caused a great influx of invalids and pleasure-seekers into Saratoga. The extensive hotels of the place were crowded to their utmost capacity, and the farmers of the vicinity were reaping a rich harvest in the lively market thus afforded them. He had sold one-half of the city plat to Edwin Forrest, the great tragedian, for $30,000, who was about to expend a large amount of money in further improvements. This was all done to induce some Eastern speculator to buy the property at a fabulous price. Saratoga city has never contained but one house, and that is now gone.

MURDER.

Wm. Beulley was killed by his brother-in-law, John Roach, who often visited Beulley at his house, and engaged in drinking and playing cards. A dispute arose, and in a scuffle between the parties, Roach stabbed Beulley in the abdomen, who died in a few hours. Roach was brought to trial and convicted of homicide, and recommended to the mercy of the judge. He was fined $50.

PERSONAL SKETCHES.

We will now complete the history of Dexter township by giving biographical sketches of several of its most prominent citizens:

James Allyn (deceased) came from Allegany county, N. Y., to Michigan, in July, 1830, and entered 160 acres of land on sec. 31, Dexter tp., where he settled, and lived the remainder of his life. He was married to Eliza Prosser, of German descent, and by this marriage some 9 children were sent to make home pleasant, 8 of whom are living in this State, 6 in Washtenaw county. James S., the youngest child, now owns and occupies the old homestead with his aged mother, he being a single man. He is a fond son, a good neighbor, and a well-respected citizen.

Joseph Arnold, deceased, was born March 31, 1799, in Rensselaer Co., New York, and was of English parentage. He received a fair education, and learned the carpenter's trade when a young man. He married Margaret Van Reuster, of Portage, N. Y., and emigrated to Michigan in 1822. They came first to Detroit, and followed an Indian trail to Pontiac, where they procured a "dug-out," a barrel of flour, with a small supply of other necessaries, and in company with Rufus Crossman, floated down the Huron river till they came to the spot where now stands Dexter village, then a dense forest. Here they halted, raised a tent, and proceeded to locate a piece of land. This they did, said land being a quarter section and now known as the Scott farm. This piece Mr. A. improved somewhat, erected thereon a two-story frame house, and sent east for his family. This pioneer house was soon made cheerful by the presence of Mrs. Arnold, and was used as a favorite inn by the weary, westward-bound emigrant. It was also the scene of many a ball, festivity and religious service, and has the honor of being the first frame dwelling erected in Dexter tp. Mr. Arnold from this time became prosperous, and at various times added tracts of land to his estate. In 1829, the forests echoed the voice of a new comer, a little infant daughter having been sent to this happy and prosperous pioneer couple. She was named Mary C. Next came William H., J. Y., George W. and Ebenezer. In 1868, two of the sons, Ebenezer and J. Y. were killed by the explosion of a saw-mill, which they were operating at the time. William Arnold now owns and resides on the estate, consisting of 490 acres, 120 of which is covered with timber. On March 24, 1856, he was married to Elizabeth Dancer, daughter of William and Ann Dancer, of Lima tp. This union resulted in the birth of 8 children—Anne, deceased, was the wife of Homer G. Ives, of Livingston county; Maggie, Mary, Lizzie, Eva, William, Ralph and Arthur. Miss Sarah Arnold, a maiden lady of 88 summers, has been a member of the family for 12 years past. She came to Michigan in October, 1832. Mr. Arnold is an Odd Fellow; has been Township Treasurer, Justice of the Peace and Township Director of Schools for nine years, ending in 1879.

Peter Beckers, deceased, was born in Germany in 1825, and emigrated to America in 1856, settling at Amherst, Ohio, where he worked at his trade of stone-cutting for nearly 10 years. While living here he married Mary Robinson, also of German ancestry. Two children were born in Ohio, Benjamin and Anna. In 1865 he removed to Dexter tp., and purchased of Dennis Carr, 85 acres of land on sec. 27, where another son, John, was born the same year. He lived here till his death, which occurred Feb. 27, 1823, from injuries received in a stone quarry when living in Ohio. The oldest son, Benjamin, was married Dec. 8, 1880, to Effie Brandon, of Bristol, N. Y., and now lives on the old homestead with his wife and mother.

Thomas Burkett, farmer and merchant, Dexter tp., was born in Cumberland, England, Jan. 9, 1833, and emigrated to America in 1852. While a youth in his native land he had learned the milling trade, and arriving in Washtenaw county in 1853, he obtained a position with D. D. Sloan & Co., of the Dover Mills, as third miller. He met with success and favor, and in 1854 was put in charge of the entire milling business, which position he held till the death of Mr. Sloan in 1861, when he bought a half interest in the business, and in 1862 the remaining half, and still owns the mill. He has made several improvements, fitting it up with modern machinery and appliances, till it now ranks with the best mills in the county. Mr. B. also owns the Hudson mill property, a large mill doing only custom work. He is closely identified with the lumber interest of Michigan, being a member of the firm of McPherson, Burkett & Co., manufacturers and dealers in pine lumber, with central office at Howell, and mills and yard at Caldwell Station, on the D. L. & N. R. R. He also owns a fine farm of 400 acres, lying along the west banks of the Hudson river, and north of Portage lake, which contains 2,000 fine, thrifty peach trees. He makes the breeding of fine cattle a specialty, and has a very excellent herd of short-horns on the estate. His house is situated on a four-acre plateau, on the bank of the Huron, and at the eastern slope of Prospect Hill, which is the highest point of altitude in the lower peninsula of Michigan. It is a four-story frame structure, capped with a Mansard roof, built in 1871, and furnished with all the modern appliances for making a home cheerful and pleasant. He erected at his own expense the Dover church, situated a few rods west of his house, being a frame structure 28x36 feet in size, Gothic in design, well lighted, and open for worship to all believers in God, irrespective of color, nationality or creed. The pulpit is filled every Sunday by Rev. W. C. Allen, Congregational minister, of Webster tp. Mr. Burkett was married to Mrs. Sarah A. Grundon, of Yates Co., N. Y., and there has been 1 child sent to bless this happy union—Nellie, born Jan. 16, 1857.

William Cobb, farmer, sec. 36, Dexter tp.; P. O. Dexter; was born in England in 1830, emigrated to America in 1845, and settled in Washtenaw county in 1875. He was married in Jackson county, Mich., in 1850, to Mary A. Lyseamile, born in England in 1835. They have 8 children—Antoinette, William H., Carson K., Chloe, Carlton, Libbie, Anna and Mary. Mr. Cobb has never allied himself with any political party, but always endeavors to vote for the men who will best serve their respective localities.

Charles Cooper, Dexter tp.; was born in England Aug. 27, 1828. He emigrated with his parents to America in 1836, and settled in Canada, where he was married in 1852 to Miss Emma J. Hooper, of Bradford, Canada, a daughter of Richard Hooper, a ship-carpenter. He removed to this county in 1859, and settled in Scio tp., but in 1872 again moved, this time into Dexter tp., where he now resides. He received his education in this country during boyhood, and afterward made farming his occupation. They have 8 children—Walter, Henry L., George, Augusta A., Alfred W., Charles G., Nettie and Willie J. Mr. Cooper owns 120 acres of land on sec. 19, and 40 acres in Lyndon tp. Mr. and Mrs. Cooper have been faithful and consistent members of the North Lake M. E. Church for eight years.

Thomas Dolan, farmer, sec. 26, Dexter tp.; was born in Ireland in 1803, and in 1843 emigrated to America, settling on his present farm, where he has since resided. In 1832, while a resident of Ireland, he married Bridget Clomin, who was born in Ireland in 1808. Nine children have been sent to bless this union, 8 of whom are living—Patrick, William, Thomas, Michael and John (twins), Frank, Mary, wife of John McGinnis, and Rosa. Mr. Dolan is a faithful member of the Roman Catholic Church, and in politics is a Democrat. Mr. D. owns a farm of 180 acres, valued at $50 per acre.

Patrick Fleming, farmer and stock-raiser, Dexter tp.; was born in Ireland Aug. 15, 1822, and emigrated with his parents, Michael and Mary Fleming, to America when but a lad, settling in Lyndon tp., where his father died in 1863. His mother is still living, at the age of 86. Being one of 12 children, 6 of whom are living and residents of this county, he received but a limited education, and when old enough went into the employ of the Michigan Central R. R. Co., where he remained until 1848, when, having accumulated money enough, he opened a small grocery in Hudson, Dexter tp., and two years later sold out his stock to a good advantage, and immediately started for California, entering a few mining claims, and by four years' hard toil and economizing, he was rewarded with quite a sum of money. He returned home and purchased 200 acres of land on sec. 25, Dexter tp. He made a second trip to California in 1856 and disposed of his interests in that "land of gold." He came back to his farm and the same year married Johanna O'Haire, daughter Michael and Ellen O'Haire, of Scio tp. The result of this alliance has been the birth of 8 children—Mary, Ellen, Henry, Julia, Jessie, Maggie, John and Caroline, all of whom are still living with their parents. Mr. F. owns one of the most substantial residences in this county, its walls being constructed wholly of a quality of stone found on the premises, and known in this section as "hard head." He has been honored with several local offices, and also represented his tp. in the County Board of Supervisors for six years, ending in 1875. He is the chief officer in the Dexter Grange, and an influential citizen of the township.

John Glenn (deceased) was one of the oldest and most respected pioneers of Washtenaw Co. He emigrated from Frye tp., Seneca Co., N. Y., to Michigan in 1833, and entered a tract of land along the south bank of North lake, Dexter tp., where he resided until his death. His young wife, formerly Jane Brown, and of New England parentage, came with him, and was a faithful helper in all pertaining to the comforts of home, and an able assistant and adviser in matters relating to the advancement of the religious and educational interests of the community. Mr. G., in company with his brother Richard, built, with their own money and labor, the first school-house erected at North Lake. He died in 1868 at the age of 62, leaving a wife and 5 children to mourn his loss. Two of his sons, Robert C. and William H., still reside on the old homestead. The former was born June 10, 1835, and in his youth received a careful school and home training, completing his studies at the State Normal school situated at Ypsilanti. At 23 years of age he was married to Jane Hudson, daughter of Alvah and Henrietta Hudson, of Lyndon tp. This son occupies the old family residence and oversees his farm, which is also a popular place of summer resort, being located along the south shore of the lake.

This lake is abundantly supplied with pickerel, bass, mullet, pike, and trout, and attracts many disciples of Izaak Walton at all times of the year. The other son, William H., was born on the old homestead, and received his education largely at home. Sept. 30, 1850, he was joined in marriage to Matilda J. Watts, of Lyndon tp., and immediately settled on a portion of the family farm lying south of his brother's, where he still resides. In addition to farming he has lately been engaged in the Fire and Life Insurance business, which has proven very remunerative to him. He inherits the characteristic energy and enterprise of his father, along with the noble and refined traits of his mother, which have aided him considerably in his way through life. He is connected with the Grange interest, and with his wife, is a member of the North Lake Church. Six children, 5 daughters and 1 son, have been sent to bless this alliance; Emory L., Emma, wife of R. W. Wolf, of Howell, Mich., Minnie C., Lulu M., Mary L. and Rose J.

Charles Goodwin, farmer, is the son of Richard and Laura Goodwin, natives of England, who emigrated to this county in 1833, and settled in Lyndon tp., then removed to Scio tp., where Charles was born Sept. 30, 1839. He received an early educational training at home, and afterward finished his studies at Ann Arbor in 1861, when he engaged as a teacher, which profession he followed in this county till 1867. In February, 1865, he married Mary E., daughter of Edgar D. and Ruth Ann Austin, of Scio tp. He then settled on a farm in Scio tp., where a son, Edgar, was born; afterward removed to Alaiedon tp., Ingham county, where he remained five years; thence to Virginia, and lived in the "Old Dominion" four years, then returning to his native county. His second son, Clayton, was born in Ingham county; third son, Irving, in Virginia, and Nellie, the only daughter, in Ann Arbor. Mr. G. owns 197 acres of land on sec. 15. He is a Republican, and an enterprising citizen.

John Hall (deceased), who passed to his final rest in 1880, was one of the oldest and most respected citizens of Dexter tp. He was born May 30, 1803, in Eaton tp., Washington Co., N. Y. His parents were members of the early Society of Friends, and he was reared in the "straight and narrow way," as his after life fully indicated. His mother died when he was an infant, and he was given to the care and protection of his grandmother till his father's second marriage, four years later, when he moved to Oxford, Cheneango Co., in 1808, remaining there six years. In 1814 he moved to Mayfield, Montgomery Co., and lived there till 1817. His father being a mechanic, John naturally took to the use of tools, and became quite proficient in that business. When a young man he formed a partnership with one Belding, and they did a thriving business in the jobbing line, up to 1837, when he emigrated with his parents to Michigan, settled in Lenawee county, where he followed his trade until he came to Dexter tp., in 1841. In this latter place he developed one of the best farms in the county, raised a family of children, and died at the ripe old age of 77. The old farm was left to his son John, jr., who now resides in a new house opposite the old homestead. John Hall, jr. was born Dec. 4, 1843, received his early education at Ypsilanti, and completed it at Ann Arbor. At the age of 33 he married Kate B. Gleason, daughter of A. W. Gleason, of Dexter. This marriage took place March 21, 1876. They have been blessed with 2 sons—Eugene W., deceased, and Homer G. Mr. H. is a member of the A. O. U. W., and also of the Masonic fraternity. The Hall estate consists of 215 acres of cultivated land and 25 acres of timbered land, all lying on sec. 25.

Green Johnson, Dexter tp., was born at New Lisbon, Otsego Co., N. Y., Aug. 13, 1828, and is a brother of the next mentioned. He came to Michigan with his parents at the age of 13, and received the greater part of his education in the district schools of this county. With industry and perseverance he acquired a small property, and from time to time has added to his possessions, till at present he owns 192 acres of good land, of which 50 is timbered, all lying on secs. 29 and 30. On Feb. 1, 1860, he was married to Cynthia W. Ferguson, born May 8, 1835, and of Scotch descent, having come with her parents to Michigan in 1838 and settled in Ann Arbor. They have 4 children living—Albert, Ettie, Ella and Freddie. Mr. J. has been a prominent man in politics, and filled the office of Township Treasurer in 1858, and that of Commissioner in 1873.

Horace N. Johnson, Dexter tp., is a native of Lisbon tp., Otsego Co., N. Y., where he was born in 1819. His father, Peleg Johnson, was of English descent, and his mother, Abigail Olive, of Welsh parentage. They came to Dexter tp. in 1833, when Horace was 14 years old. He received liberal schooling in New York, and also after coming to this county. At the age of 21 he had mastered the wheelwright trade, but never followed it as a business. On Nov. 9, 1846, he was married to Hannah Risley, and 8 children were the fruits of this union, 5 of whom are living—Clarence, Emeline, Valorus B., Willis N. and Herbert. The mother of these children passed away from earth Jan. 29, 1867. Mr. J. married Mary J. Brown, of Dexter, born at Palmyra, Ontario Co., N. Y., daughter of Jacob Brown. She came to Michigan with her parents at the age of two years. Mr. Johnson is the possessor of 160 acres of land on sec. 29, and 200 acres on sec. 30. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and a highly respected citizen.

Hon. William A. Jones, deceased, was born in Otsego county, N. Y., Oct. 2, 1811, and in 1833 removed with his parents from Monroe county, N. Y., to Michigan, settling upon the farm on which he died, in Dexter tp., the following summer. At the age of 25 he married Elizabeth S. Kidmore. Mrs. Jones died in 1858. About the year 1843 or '44 he was elected Supervisor of the township, an office which he filled for 13 years, and nine years in succession. He was once elected State Senator, and was seldom free from the duties of some township office until failing health compelled him to decline being nominated for any office. He was a passionate admirer of flowers, and always had large beds of them at home, which he tended with the utmost care and precision. His health gradually declined for several years, although for the most part he was comfortable until during the last two years of his life, when he suffered at times intensely. The disease that terminated his life on this earth was consumption.

Alfred Lavey, farmer, Dexter tp., was born in New York Dec. 28, 1833, and is the son of Patrick and Rose Lavey, natives of Ireland. His parents emigrated to America in 1827, and settled in New York, where they remained seven years. They then removed to Michigan, and settled in Dexter tp., in 1837, when the subject of this sketch was about four years old. He received a common education in the district schools of the county, but at the age of 19 was seized with the "gold fever," and went to California, remaining there engaged in mining till 1856, when he returned home. He had been somewhat successful during his four years' absence, and in 1857 was married to Ann Murthey, of Ann Arbor, purchased 80 acres of land on section 27, erected a comfortable house and settled down to active farm life. They have been blessed with 9 children—Francis, Rosanna, Charles, George, Elizabeth, William, Ellen, Louis, and Mary. Mr. L. has added to his estate at different periods, and at present owns 182 acres of fine farm land. He is a man of steady habits, a good citizen, and enjoys the respect of all with whom he is acquainted.

Christopher McGuire, farmer, Dexter tp., was born in North Ireland May 10, 1840, and emigrated to America with his parents in 1848, and to this county the same year, where he located on sec. 28 of Dexter tp. He suffered the loss of his mother in early life, she dying on board the vessel during the voyage to this country. His father died at his home in Dexter tp., Aug. 30, 1868, where the subject of our sketch now resides. He was married Sept. 15, 1865, to Anna Rabbit, of this county, and she bore him 7 children—Michael, Mary, Agnes, Rose, Emma, Alice and Christopher. She died Feb. 13, 1879. Mr. M. is the happy possessor of 515 acres of good land in Dexter and Lima tps.

He came to Michigan in 1867, and located at Howell, Livingston county, where he was engaged in the fruit-tree business, and soon after appointed Deputy Sheriff, serving in that capacity for five months, then tendered his resignation, and since that time has followed farming as an occupation. Dec. 19, 1872, he was married to Eunice L. Warner, of Dexter, and settled in their present home, consisting of 65 acres of excellent land, eight acres being covered

His parents removed to Michigan in 1832 and settled on sec. 33, Dexter tp., where the former died in 1864 at the age of 80; the latter departed this life in 1878, at the advanced age of 88. Mr. P. has operated the homestead farm since 1843, and cared for his parents till death called them away. In 1844 he married Caroline Kellogg, a native of New York, and of New England descent. This union has been blessed with 3 children—Francis, wife of James Doty, of Dexter tp., Marion and Clara. Mr. P. owns 200 acres of land, 15 acres timbered, and in connection with his wife is a consistent member of the M. E. Church at Dexter.

They came to this county in 1831 and settled in Lima tp., where the former died in 1872 and the latter in 1854. Jesse was married Feb. 22, 1844, to Louisa Adams, born in New York in 1821, daughter of Nathan and Sallie Adams. Two children were born to them—Eugene M. and Frank A. His father was a surveyor by profession, but was offered and accepted a position as landscape gardener for Aaron Burr, remaining in this position two years, and then removing to Monroe Co., N. Y., where he followed his profession and accumulated quite a property, dying there in 1821. Andrew being a third heir, received but a small portion of the estate, according to the laws regulating the division of property. He had acquired a good education, which he found of great benefit to him in after life. In 1815 he was married to Lucinda Dillingham, and settled in Monroe county, where their 7 children were born, of whom was W. D. Smith, born May 21, 1828, and Maria, born Sept. 24, 1819. He came to Michigan in 1839, and entered sec. 16, Dexter tp., where he settled, and lived till death called him up higher. He died in October, 1849, at the age of 59. His son, W. D. Smith, owns 420 acres of the old section, 320 of which are improved. He has held several local offices, and is a prominent officer of the North Lake Grange.

William E. Stevenson was born at Hackensack, N. J., Oct. 23, 1831. His father, Hay Stevenson, was of Scotch birth, and emigrated to America when a young man; was married and remained in the East till 1833, when he came to Michigan with his family of 4 children, and settled on sec. 18, in Dexter tp. In this place William E. was sent to the district school, and obtained as liberal an education as it offered. On April 9, 1862, he was married to Margaret E. Southerton, but she only survived nine years after these nuptials were celebrated, leaving him childless. He married Anna C. Webb April 8, 1873. Three children are the fruits of this union—Emma L., Anna C. and William E. Mr. Stevenson owns 260 acres of land in Dexter tp., 160 acres in Oakland county, also 50 acres in Grand Rapids, Mich. He is an honorable man in all his dealings, and a successful farmer. Mrs. S. is a member of the North Lake M. E. Church.

Augur Taylor, farmer, Dexter tp., was born in England, Jan. 8, 1824, and emigrated to America with his parents, George and Nancy Taylor, in 1841. They came westward and settled in Unadilla tp., Livingston county, Mich., where he remained with his parents until 1853, when he made a two years' trip to California in search of his fortune, returning in the spring of '55 with a comfortable sum in his pocket. He then purchased of David Dudley 240 acres of land on sec. 24, Dexter tp., where he now resides. Oct. 10, 1866, he was married to Elizabeth Ann Flinlaft, of Northfield tp., and the result of this alliance has been 6 children—Carrie A., Lillie G., Sarah N., Mary E., Myrta May and Bertie A., all of whom are living. In 1878 Mr. Taylor erected upon his property one of the finest residences in Dexter tp., being finished in modern style with latest improved conveniences. He enjoys the respect and good will of all his neighbors.

R. S. Whalen, farmer, Dexter tp., was born at Hartford, Conn., in 1845. His father, Thomas Whalen, was a native of Ireland, and emigrated to America when but a youth. He was a sculptor of some ability, and followed his profession as a life work, in the different towns and cities lying between New Orleans and New York. He died in the latter place when Robert was 10 years old, and where he had received an early education. Mrs. W. married Daniel Hagerty, with whom she removed to Michigan in 1855, bringing her son with her, and where he finished his education. In 1862 he enlisted in the 7th Mich. Cavalry, and served three years and 41 days in doing gallant and noble work in that long and memorable conflict, engaging in 42 battles, and being only wounded once, which was a saber cut on his forehead. He was taken prisoner at Yellow Tavern, Va., May 11, 1864, and marched to Andersonville prison, where he suffered the untold agonies of hunger and thirst for four long, weary, dreary months. At the end of this time he was transferred to Milan and held for two months; afterward re-captured by the "boys in blue," and received an honorable discharge July 15, 1865. In 1867 he married Harriet E. Johnson, and by this union 2 sons were born to them, Emmet and Thomas. The mother died in 1863. In 1877 he married Mrs. Emma J.

Glenn, widow of B. H. Glenn. By this latter alliance 1 child has been born, a daughter, named Mabel, born Nov. 8, 1880. Mrs. W had 2 sons by her first marriage—Robert D. and Benjamin H. Mr. Whalen owns 160 acres on sec. 17 and 40 acres on sec. 8, which are the result of a life-long work, full of trials and hardships, but now sufficient to enable him to live comfortably the remainder of his days on this earth.

William Wood, farmer, Dexter tp., was born in New York Feb. 3, 1834, and emigrated to Michigan with his parents in 1844, settling in Oakland county. Mr. Wood's father was a carpenter by trade, and the son acquired enough of this trade when a boy to turn it to practical use in the future. After coming to this county, he entered school at Ypsilanti, where he obtained a fair education. Nov. 15, 1855, he was married to Lucy M. Glenn, daughter of John Glenn. They have 6 children—Jane, Lucy M., Clara B., Mary A., Bertha E. and Mattie M. He owns 140 acres of good tillable land, and is a member of the M. E. Church and North Lake Grange.

LYNDON TOWNSHIP.

PHYSICAL CHARACTERISTICS.

The township comprises 36 sections within the boundaries mentioned in the act of organization. The soil is a sandy loam, with clay subsoil in many places. Many tamarack swamps are found within its limits, producing some good timber; but the principal timber is comprised in oak and hickory.

The lakes are numerous and beautiful. In many places the crystal sheets lay untroubled, embosomed within their surrounding hills. They comprise South lake, Collins lake, Bruen lake, Ireland lake, Gorman's lake, Clarke's lake, Watson lake, Cassidy's lake, Sugar-Loaf lake, Mud lake, Spruce lake, Sullivan lake, Wild-Goose lake, Half-Moon lake, Blind lake, Eagle lake, Daniel's lake, Boyce lake, in section 8, Wessel's lake, in section 18, Moran lake in section 29, Rook lake in section 35, and Moore lake in section 36. The ponds are extraordinary in their number and constituents. Few of them are surrounded with those murky formations peculiar to such small bodies of water, while many are almost great springs in the quality of their waters and clear approaches. The most extensive lake is South lake, which extends from the northeast quarter of section 10 to the heights in the northeastern portion of section 16. The southeast portion, with Eagle lake, and expansions of Gorman creek, may be said to occupy the greatest part of the northwest quarter of section 15. Collins, Bruen and Daniel's lakes, with six smaller bodies or ponds, are found in the northern sections of the township. Island lake, in section 23, presents a landscape peculiarly beautiful. Sugar-Loaf lake lies hidden behind a hill bearing a similar name; it covers a large area, and with Mud lake appears to occupy one-thirty-sixth part of the township. Cassidy's, Clarke's, Rook and Moore lakes are found in the southern sections. Throughout the district hill and valley abound, so that with all its lakes, streams, forests and homes, the township forms a tract characterized by a beautiful picturesqueness.

The salt springs of Lyndon are numerous and rich. The Hildburgh lime rock, found in the township, is covered with shells and forms, perhaps one of the strangest subjects treated in the geological chapter. It may be said that every acre of land within the township is in the hands of an occupying proprietary. The mineral productions are confined to tufa and shell marl. The district is purely an agricultural one.

AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

The number of acres of improved land in the township is set down at 11,433, the number unimproved 7,795, the number of farms 123. An equal division of the 19,228 acres of land in the township would show 156 $\frac{1}{2}$ acres per farm. The number of acres under wheat in 1879 was 2,795, yielding an average of 18.91 bushels per acre, and producing in toto 52,853 bushels. In May, 1880, there were 3,000 acres sown under wheat.

The corn crop of 1879 yielded 68,468 bushels, grown on 1,212 acres; while the 234 acres devoted to oats produced 6,781 bushels. Three hundred and sixty-four acres of clover yielded 448 bushels of seed, and 16 acres of barley produced 303 bushels. Seventy-five acres planted with potatoes gave a yield of 4,387 bushels; 1,946 acres of grass land produced 2,140 tons of hay.

This exhibit does of itself show the wealth of the soil. Though dealing with 1879, it refers, in one instance, to the number of acres under wheat in 1880; and if the acreage has been so increased for the other crops, the statistics of 1880 will show an advance at once steady and encouraging.

SETTLEMENT.

In August, 1833, the pioneer brothers, Selah B., Josiah H. and Harrison W. Collins, arrived in the township. Without tarrying for a day of zephyr breezes they erected a forester's wigwam, cut a quantity of luxuriant blue-grass with which they surrounded their primitive house, and otherwise prepared for the advance of winter. Early in November they raised the first log house ever erected within the confines of Lyndon, but this remained untenanted until Jan. 1, 1834, when the eldest brother moved into it, with his newly wedded wife. During that year a clearance of 40 acres in extent was effected by the Collins brothers, and this joined two extensive plains, all of which received the name "Collins' Plains," and the lake near by that of "Collins' lake."

OTHER PIONEERS.

After S. B. Collins had established his home in this beautiful land, many flocked thither to make it their home also. During 1834-'35 the new settlement received substantial additions: Abner Bruen, John Green, Henry G. Holmes, Michael Gilman, Samuel Boyce, Nathan Rose, Dr. John Cooper, Abraham Burgitt, John Twomley, Alfred Bruce, Jasper Moore, William Watts, John Coleman, Hugh Wade, David Coleman, James Stryker, William Wilcox and George Sellars.

On New Year's Day, 1836, Josiah H. Collins and his wife settled on the farm now occupied by his brother Sidney. During the following summer he set out the first orchard ever planted in the township. Other settlers flocked toward the land in 1836, among whom were Horace Leek and family, who located on section 18; Eli Rockwell, on section 8; Orman Clark, on section 34, who is still living on the farm; Jesse Rose, Owen McIntee, on section 19, died in 1880 (this settler had reached the age of something over 104 years); John and Hugh Cassidy, on sections 32 and 33; Joseph Yocum, father of John K. Yocum; John and Ira Gifford, John Davidson, Joseph Webster and Stephen Dow, with families and friends. Patrick Haggerty, William Bott and Washington Beer-man made entries of their lands in 1836, but no improvements until 1837. A great many of the early settlers came from other portions of the county, and after once getting a good start the township settled up rapidly.

THE FIRST WHITE WOMAN

in the town was Mrs. Parmelia Collins, daughter of John Green, who settled on the farm now owned by Jeremiah Pickell, in 1836. Mr. Green died in 1880. Mrs. Winans and Mrs. Garry Briggs came soon after and were Parmelia Collins' first neighbors, although they settled in Livingston county, near the line.

THE PROMISED LAND.

In the earlier years the county was known as the "Promised Land," a name given all that part of the town west of the Short Hills, by Elnathan Noble, who a few years prior to the settlement made by the Collins's, had been on a hunting tour; and on getting on a high hill, not far from the village of Unadilla, looked westward, and, seeing the beautiful scope of country west of the Short Hills, returned to his friends in the eastern part of the county and told them that he had discovered the "Promised Land."

ORGANIC.

Prior to the organization of Lyndon that portion of Washtenaw, with Unadilla and Josce, of Livingston county, formed a district attached to this county for judicial purposes.

The first election for township officers was held on the first Monday of April, 1833, which resulted in the choice, for supervisor, of John Drake; for clerk, Peter N. Hurd; for justice, Elnathan Noble; treasurer, James McIntyre; for commissioners of highways, Selah B. Collins, E. Noble and Francis Lincoln. At the October election held in 1835 Stevens T. Mason got 7 votes for Governor. Edward Mundy received 1 vote. Seven votes were given in favor of adopting the Constitution and 3 against.

The township of Lyndon was organized under the act of the Territorial Government, approved in 1836, laying off that portion of Washtenaw county set forth in the United States' survey, as township 1 S., of R. 3 east, into a township to be named Lyndon, and directing that the primary meeting of electors be held at the house of John Green. Subsequently, in April, 1837, the pioneers assembled as directed to the number of 42, conferred the honor of first supervisorship upon Horace Leek and elected Jesse Rose for the office of township clerk. This very important event in the history of Lyndon occurred four years after the first settlers had established for themselves a home, and at a time when the entire voters of the township did not exceed 42 persons.

The supervisors of the township since organization comprise Horace Leek, Selah B. Collins, Wm. Wilcox, E. L. Day, John K. Yocum, Thomas Clarke, Washington Beeman, Geo. Rowe, Wm. Wessell, Thomas Young and Benj. C. Boyce. The clerks comprise the names of Jesse Rose, John K. Yocum, Stephen Dow, John Harrington, Andrew J. Boyce, Andrew Greening, jr., Parminus Watts, Fred. A. Howlett and John Clark.

The list of treasurers comprise, among others, the following names: Samuel Boyce, Elnathan Skidmore, Aaron Palmer, Felix O'Neil, P. Watts, Patrick McKune and H. J. Drake. The latter has held the office for a period of 12 years.

PRESENT TOWNSHIP OFFICERS.

The supervisor of Lyndon is Benjamin C. Boyce; township clerk, John Clark; treasurer, Henry J. Drake; Wellington Bowditch, justice of the peace, elected to serve until 1884. Walter Webb, Edward May and Edward Forman are also justices of the peace. Wm. Harrison Collins, commissioner of highways and drains. Wm. Stansfield, constable.

Benjamin C. Boyce held the office of justice for a period of 23 years, Horace Leek for 12; W. Webb, 16 years; Wm. Wilcox, 8 years; Michael Gilman was elected justice at the town meeting of 1837; Thomas Young was supervisor for 12 years; Horace Leek for 6 years; Wm. Stansfield has held the position of constable for 14 years.

CHURCHES.

There are no churches in the township, although the large majority of the people belong to one section or another of the Christian Church. The proximity of Chelsea, Dexter, Unadilla and Waterloo churches renders the building of houses of worship unnecessary.

TAVERNS.

There has not been a tavern in the township for the last 35 years. In the early years of settlement Wade, Snyder, Buck, Mosier and Healy kept houses of entertainment, and a few of them taverns. Wade's tavern, as described by J. K. Yocum, was a log house covered with bark; into the side walls holes were bored, into which pins were driven; on these rested a split board or shelf. On this long shelf a bottle of whisky, a time-worn drinking glass and a pitcher with a broken handle were the only occupants. They got the water from Island lake. The other taverns were similar in almost every respect.

SCHOOLS.

It has been stated that the first private school was conducted by Miss Angel Green, and the first district school by John K. Yocum. The latter was held in a log school-building erected in the fall of 1837, on section 18, and opened during the winter term. Miss Green was the second teacher of this district school.

There are seven school buildings in the township, one situated on each of the following sections: 9, 14, 19, 21, 23, 32 and 35. The teachers of these schools in 1880 comprised Thomas Youngs, Samuel Boyce, Austin Rowe, Charles Foster and Mrs. Delia Smith. Of these houses six are frame and one brick. The school property is valued at $4,000. The Township Superintendent for 1880-'1 was Thomas Youngs; School Inspector, Henry Gorton. The attendance on these schools averages 25 to each school, or 175 pupils.

THE DEATH OF BRIETTENBACH.

The death of Briettenbach, from the result of injuries received at the hands of the Marsh brothers, in 1875, was the effect of drunkenness. The latter were picking berries on the German's lands, when Briettenbach ordered them to go away. They resisted and attacked the old man, and punished him so severely that their victim died within two days. The assaulting party came from Scio.

SEPTUAGENARIANS.

The old settlers of Lyndon over 70 years of age are as follows: Ormond Clark, Hugh Cassidy, Peter Gorman, John Cassidy, Owen Duffy, Dennis Hanker, Timothy McKune, James Gorman, Tate Watson, Alvah Hudson, James Gant, Thomas Young, John Twonley, James Moran, Thomas O'Neil, Benazer Palmer, Josiah H. Collins, Ross McKernan, Patrick McKune.

The settlers over 60 years of age and under 70 include the following: Darius M. Joslyn, Elnathan Skidmore, John K. Yocum, Washington Beeman, Jeremiah Pickell, Lawrence Shanahan, George Goodwin, John Armore, John Wallace, Robt. Hallett, James Cunningham, Walter Webb, Wm. Coulson, Wm. Purchase, Andrew Greening.

FIRST EVENTS.

1812.—The Indian boy Kishkashkijigeninini murdered his rival, Pashkashkijigeninini. The former, whose name will not be repeated, was the son of an Otchipwe brave, who made his home with the Indians of the Washtenong. The chief of the home band called his son the Greater Harvester, and thus fostered ill-will among the savage boys, with the result described. This story is legendary, and can be accepted only on the authority of half-breed interpreters, who repeated it for the surveyors in 1819.

1818.—Visit of the United States survey party.

1826.—Elnathan Noble names the township "The Promised Land."

1833.—Settlement by the Collins brothers; first settler married, S. B. Collins; first log-house built, by S. B. Collins.

1834.—First attempt at cultivating the soil; attached to Dexter for numerical purposes.

1835.—First marriage within the township was performed Christmas day by Justice Horace Leek, between Miss Harriet Gifford and Azel Turner; first celebration of Independence day; first male child born, Edwin O. Collins, Dec. 11.

1836.—First orchard planted by Josiah H. Collins; first private school taught by Miss Angel Green.

1837.—First township meeting; Horace Leek, Supervisor; first Town Clerk, Jesse Rose; first death, Mrs. Abraham Burgitt; first school-house erected; J. K. Yocum, first teacher; the wolves destroyed every hog and calf in the settlement; first sermon, preached by Elder Sayers.

1839.—A company of wolf-slayers organized with the usual result—killing deer instead of wolves.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

Following are biographical notices of several citizens of this township, whose lives have more or less been identified with its history. To most readers this department will probably be of more interest than anything else of a more public nature.

Francis A. Burkhart was born in Lyndon tp. Jan. 10, 1841. His father, William Burkhart, was born July 20, 1817, and came to this county at the age of 17 years, with the Glenn family, with whom he remained until attaining his majority. He was married in 1839 to Sarah Vedder, daughter of Aaron and Catherine Vedder, natives of New York. Francis was married in 1862 to Lucy Vickery, and 2 children have been born to them—Clara M. and Sarah A. Mrs. B. died Dec. 30, 1867. Mr. Burkhart was again married to Ellen Twomley, who was born in August, 1863, daughter of John Twomley, of Lyndon tp. Two children were sent to bless this latter union—Flora E. and William H. All the members of the family are connected with the M. E. Church. Mr. Burkhart owns 145 acres of highly cultivated land.

Hugh Cassidy was born in Ireland Sept. 21, 1801. He left his native country May 14, 1824, first stopping at Quebec, but subsequently at New York city, where he worked as a gardener for some ten years. John Clark, son of Thomas and Rose Clark, of Chelsea, was born on his present farm Jan. 17, 1851. Mr. Clark was reared on a farm, but received a liberal education in the schools of Ann Arbor. He has followed the vocation of a farmer through life, and has served his fellow townsmen in different official capacities, now holding the position of Clerk of Lyndon tp. He was married May 9, 1877, to Mary E. Cunningham, daughter of James and Johannes (Howard) Cunningham. Mrs. Clark was born at Sandusky, Ohio, Nov. 19, 1856, and is the mother of two children—Herbert and Thomas. Mr. Clark and family are worthy and respected members of the Roman Catholic Church.

Addison C. Collins, sec. 4; P. O., Unadilla, Livingston Co.; was born on his present farm in Lyndon tp., July 25, 1837, and is a son of Seth B. and Permelia (Green) Collins. He was married Dec., 1865, to Jane McCall, daughter of Alexander and Margaret McCall, of Jackson county, Mich. Both are members of the M. E. Church, and connected with the Grange at Unadilla. Mr. Collins owns 126 acres of land, the first farm settled in Lyndon tp.

In 1835 he built a house on sec. 18, Lyndon tp., and on Christmas eve of the same year married Mary Brown, daughter of Tolman Brown (deceased) of Pittsfield tp. He removed to his present farm in 1852. Of their 11 children 3 are living—Charles J., Mary E. and William B. Mrs. Collins died a few years ago. Y., and in 1835 to Lyndon tp. In October, 1837, he settled on secs. 23 and 26, and in 1856 on his present farm. When Mr. Gorman arrived in America he had but 13 shillings in his pocket, and to think of his farm of 230 acres of well improved land, his comfortable home and beautiful grounds, causes surprise and pleasurable envy in the mind of the reader. Mr. G. was married in May, 1854, to Alice Young, who was born in Ireland, Dec., 1823, a daughter of George and Catherine (Welch) Young, who settled in Washtenaw county in 1845. He was married Feb. 1, 1826, to Louisa Goodyear, who was born in Connecticut Sept. 13, 1807. Of the 11 children born to them, 7 are yet living—David, Mrs. Delia Croman, Mrs. Louisa Briggs, Mrs. Melinda Artz, Mrs. Charlotte Howlett and Mrs. Mary Gorton. Mr. Leek died in Lyndon tp. Sept. 26, 1857, and his wife followed him to the undiscovered country Oct. 9, 1874.

Luke Montague, a native of Cayuga county, N. Y., moved into Lyndon tp. in 1835, accompanied by his wife and 6 children. He was one of the six male members who helped to organize the first Presbyterian Church in this vicinity, and was chosen one of the ruling Elders at its organization, and held both the offices of Elder and Deacon until his death in 1863. In 1846 the society built a brick church, the location of which was about 80 rods over the county line in Unadilla, Livingston Co., being the first church edifice built in that tp. Mr. Montague, after a few years, located another farm just over the line in Unadilla, and moved upon it, and was one of the most enterprising citizens of that tp., and a most liberal supporter of the Church.

John E. Moore was born in Genesee county, N. Y., May 16, 1821. His parents, John and Martha Moore, were natives of New York, and came to Michigan when John was but four years of age. Mr. Moore was married Jan. 28, 1844, to Clarissa, daughter of Jacob and Martha Willsey, of Detroit. Mrs. Moore died Sept. 9, 1863, leaving 4 children—Charlotte M., Theresa, Joseph E. and Phœbe J. Mr. Moore was again married, April 18, 1866, to Ellen Y. Noyes, daughter of D. W. and Nora Noyes, now of Ann Arbor. Mrs. Moore was born in Macomb county, Mich., Sept. 7, 1834. They have 2 children—Carrie and Herbert. Mr. Moore has followed agricultural pursuits through life, and for 16 years was a Justice of the Peace. Himself and wife are members of the M. E. Church.

Benajah M. Palmer, farmer, sec. 3; P. O., Unadilla; was born in Orange county, N. Y., Aug. 22, 1808, a son of James and Deborah (Miller) Palmer, natives of Westchester Co., N. Y. When he was 10 years of age, he removed to a different part of the State, and in the fall of 1835, to Michigan, locating on sec. 3, Lyndon tp., Washtenaw county, where he has resided since with the exception of a few years engaged in milling at Unadilla, Livingston county. Mr. Palmer has been a member of the M. E. Church for many years; and in his house was effected the organization of the body at Unadilla. He was a Justice of the Peace for 12 years. On Christmas eve of 1828 Mr. P. married Sally Griffin, who was born in New York May 7, 1808, and a daughter of Joseph and Dolly (Cornell) Griffin. Seven of their children are now living—Samuel, Mary J., Hester, Jennett A., Evaline, Guila E. and Squire G.

Jeremiah Pickell, farmer, sec. 4; P. O., Unadilla; was born in Seneca county, N. Y., Feb. 27, 1820, a son of Jacob and Mary (Severs) Pickell, natives of New Jersey, and of German descent. Mr. Pickell came to Michigan in the fall of 1842, and May 24, 1843, he married Elizabeth Smith, who was born in Ontario county, N. Y., April 3, 1827, daughter of Jarvis and Lucy Smith, of Jackson county, Michigan. After their marriage they returned to Ontario county, N. Y., but in 1864, came again to Michigan, and located on their present farm. Since his removal to Washtenaw county, Mr. P. and family have been worthy members of the Presbyterian Church at Unadilla. He owns 210 acres of well-improved land. They have 7 children—Irving J., who married J. Annie Everett, and is now living on the home farm; Jarvis W., Lucy R. Sharp, Mary R. Burrick, Henrietta Palmer, Eva E. and Minnie B.

William R. Purchase, was born in Yorkshire, England, May 12, 1816, a son of John and Amy (Robertson) Purchase. He came to America in the spring of 1834, stopping at Toronto, Canada, until 1836, when he settled at Detroit, Michigan. In 1860 he settled in Lyndon tp., Washtenaw county, and in 1864 on his present farm. Mr. Purchase voted for Gov. Stevens T. Mason when he was first before the people as a candidate, and has voted for every president from Harrison to Garfield. He was married on Christmas eve, 1841, to Maria March, who was born Oct. 2, 1821, and a daughter of Daniel and Alice March, natives of Yorkshire, England. Twelve children have been given them—Edward M., a resident of Colorado, Nancy, Jane C., Maria B., William W., Alice A., Miriam E., Ella E., George, Charley V., Carrie E. and Hattie B., all of whom, with their parents, are members of the M. E. Church. Mr. Purchase owns a good farm on secs. 23 and 23.

George Sellers, Jr., was born in New York city, Oct. 30, 1828, and came with his parents to Lyndon tp. in 1836. He was married Nov. 17, 1857, to Betsey A. Drake, of Lyndon tp., who was born in Wayne county, N. Y., Oct. 16, 1841. They have 3 children—Amanda, George H. and Mary. Maggie is deceased. Mr. Sellers was a soldier in Co. K, 20th Regt. Mich. Vol Inf., and during that time suffered the untold horrors of a southern prison for a few months. His father, George Sellers, sr. (dec.), was a pioneer of this county, having arrived here October, 1836, and 6 of his children are still living—Edward, George, Thomas Cartraw, a step-son, and three daughters. Mrs. Sellers died in April, 1880.

Elnathan Skidmore, was born in Otsego county, N. Y., April 13, 1818, son of Isaac and Sarah (Lull) Skidmore, the former a native of Connecticut, and the latter of New York. Mr. Skidmore accompanied his parents to Michigan in March, 1838, locating first in Dexter tp. His father died at Unadilla, Livingston county, in 1842. His mother died in 1865. In May, 1840, Mr. S. had an attack of the "shakes," which prostrated him for over a year. Jan. 14, 1841, he married Mary A. Green, who was born in New Jersey, March, 1820, daughter of John and Sarah Green, formerly of this county. They settled on their present farm in Lyndon tp. March 8, 1857. They have been worthy members of the Baptist Church since its organization some 20 years ago. Mr. Skidmore has been Superintendent of the Sunday-school over 17 years. At the annual meeting of the Stockbridge Union Agricultural Society, in 1879, he was chosen President, and has since filled that office to the general satisfaction of its numerous members and friends.

Mr. Skidmore's portrait is given in this work.

John Twomley was among the first settlers of Lyndon tp.; was born in County Wicklow, Ireland, in 1809, and May 28, 1834, was married to Ellen Molyneux. They set sail from Liverpool, Eng., July 7, 1834, and in November of the same year entered land in Lyndon tp., Washtenaw county. Mr. Twomley was engaged in mercantile pursuits in his native country, and this occupation had done but little to prepare him for the rough and arduous duties of pioneer life. His ready money did not last long after his arrival in the county, and he afterward said his money had almost gone before he learned to take care of himself and family in his adopted country. Six children were given to Mr. Twomley and wife, 4 of whom are yet living—Mrs. Sarah Parshall, Mrs. Ellen Burkhart, Mrs. Maggie Bird and Henry. Mrs. Twomley died Dec. 17, 1855, and was buried in North Lake cemetery.

Henry, only surviving son of John Twomley, was born in Lyndon tp., Jan. 28, 1839. He was reared and educated in the district schools, and Jan. 1, 1867, married Eugenie Peatt, daughter of Thomas Peatt, a well-known citizen of Dexter, who died in 1876. They have 2 children—Harry, born in February, 1867, and Terzah, born in May, 1872. Mr. Twomley is engaged in farming, and owns 150 acres of land, with a comfortable dwelling thereon.

Tate Watson, farmer, sec. 1; P. O., Unadilla, Livingston county; was born in Yorkshire, England, Oct. 9, 1810. His parents, George and Mary Watson, emigrated to America in 1834, first stopping at Wyoming, N. Y., where Tate remained 11 years, and then removed to Washtenaw county, Mich., permanently locating on sec. 1, where he has since lived. Mr. Watson received his education in England, and has been very fortunate in business affairs, having accumulated sufficient means to enable him to pass the remainder of his days in peace and plenty. He was married in 1845 to Mary McMichael, a native of Scotland. They had 2 children—Mary, wife of Charles Yocum, of Ingham county, Mich., and George, who died when an infant. Mrs. Watson died in June, 1866, and is interred in Unadilla cemetery. Mr. W. was again married, Nov. 24, 1868, to Mrs. Harriet Yocum, wife of Mahlon Yocum (dec.), who was born in New York city Nov. 3, 1831, and daughter of Geo. and Sarah (Sellers) Yocum. By her former marriage she has 2 children—Jennie L. and Milton T.

Walter Webb, one of Lyndon township's representative citizens, was born at Brails, Warwickshire, Eng., March 9, 1811, and is a son of Walter and Margaret Webb, natives of the same village. Mr. Webb was reared on a farm, and has been engaged in agricultural pursuits through life. He was married in 1834 to Ann Lamphrey, a native of Oxfordshire, England. Six children were sent to bless this happy and congenial union, 3 of whom are living—John, Walter and Sarah. The deceased are Maria, Emily and Ellen. Mr. Webb came to America in July, 1849, but shortly before leaving the land of his birth, he was called to the sad duty of laying at rest one who had ever proved a faithful wife, a loving mother, and a sympathizing friend and neighbor. Some years after, he was joined in the holy bonds of wedlock to Mrs. Mary Stiles, a native of New York, who was the mother of 3 children by her former husband—Sarah, Frank and Hattie. When Mr. Webb purchased his present farm, it was covered by heavy timber, interspersed with thick underbrush; but he did not falter, nor cast one shadow of regret over the fate that had caused him to make a home among the wilds of Washtenaw county. He went resolutely to work, and his present beautiful farm and comfortable dwelling readily attests his unremitting toil and enterprising spirit. He is a man possessing a genial and sociable nature, and is well-respected by his neighbors throughout the county. Mr. Webb has satisfactorily filled the office of Justice of the Peace for over 23 years, and himself and wife have been worthy members of the M. E. Church, at North Lake, for a long period. A portrait of Mr. Webb appears in another portion of this work.

O. A. Willsey, a farmer, and son of Jacob and Martha Willsey, formerly of Dexter tp., was born in Niagara county, N. Y., June 24, 1821. He accompanied his parents to Michigan in the fall of 1834, settling in the southwest part of Dexter tp., Washtenaw county. His father entered timbered land and cut a couple of forked saplings, which, after placing them against a tree and placing on them a ridge pole he covered with blankets, thus forming his first home in Michigan for his wife and 8 children. Mr. Willsey has traveled extensively, and gained an amount of practical knowledge very useful and interesting. He was married in Detroit Dec. 3, 1849, to Miriam Purchase, who was born in Yorkshire, England, Sept. 27, 1821, daughter of John and Amy Purchase. Mrs. Willsey was a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church of Detroit, for several years, but has lately attended the Church of that denomination at Dexter. Mr. Willsey owns 160 acres of land, and resides in a pleasant and comfortable home.

Hon. John K. Yocum, sec. 30; was born in Montgomery county, Pennsylvania, March 27, 1819. His parents, Jacob and Hannah Yocum, were natives of the same county, and came to Washtenaw county, Michigan, in 1836, settling on sec. 20, of Lyndon tp. Mr. Yocum worked on a farm in summers and taught school in winters for many years. In 1850 he was elected to the State Legislature, also serving in the extra session the following winter. In 1863 he was appointed Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and served in that capacity over five years. In 1867 he received the appointment of U. S. Inspector of Liquors of a district comprising this and three contiguous counties. He has been a Deputy Surveyor of Washtenaw county for the past 30 years. Mr. Yocum was married in Lyndon tp., Nov. 26, 1846, to Maria Ann Johnson, and 4 children have been given them—Charles A., Adelia A., Adelbert D. and Melvin F., all married and with comfortable homes.

Thomas Young, farmer, sec. 17; P. O., Chelsea; was born in Louth, Ireland, Nov. 9, 1816, a son of George and Catherine (Welch) Young, of Scotch descent. Mr. Young came to America in 1839, arriving in New York the last of June. He traveled through several States of the Union and in August, 1858, settled in Washtenaw county. He was married at Leroy, Genesee Co., N. Y., in 1843, to Elizabeth Kelley, who was born in 1824, a daughter of Thomas and Catherine (Taffe) Kelley, natives of Ireland. They have 9 children—Thomas, Edward, James, John, Peter, Rosa, Mary, Elizabeth and Ellen. Mr. Young and family are members of the Catholic Church. He owns 346 acres of valuable land.

SYLVAN TOWNSHIP.

The town of Sylvan was first settled in 1830 by Cyrus Beckwith, who located the east half of section 14. Having built the dwelling of the pioneer, he brought hither his family and won for them, as well as for himself, the honor which pertains to the township pioneers. Wm. A. Begole accompanied him in his first travels, explored the district with him, aided in the erection of the log house, and having completed the round of duty due by a friend, he, in 1831, located a homestead in the vicinity. Subsequently the tide of immigration flowed toward the land, and within a very few years not an acre of the township was without its owner,—ready and willing to draw from the virgin soil all the fruits which it would yield.

The physical characteristics do not vary materially from those of Northfield township, except in the course of the streams, which run eastward. The lakes occupy almost a similar geographical position, namely, the northwestern corner of the township, Mill creek, Snake lake and Goose lake, in the south, being something extra, not bestowed upon the other division of the county with which the similitude is drawn. In almost every other respect there is a wide difference. Sylvan possesses a village of exceeding beauty, Chelsea, a hamlet of high hopes, Sylvan Center, and a large number of extensive farms cultivated by the occupying owners. The Michigan Central railroad, may be said to divide the township almost equally. What the northern portion lost in land is fully compensated for by its lakes and streams. Kavanaugh, Crooked, Mill, Cedar, Doyle, Leman's and Rudolph's lakes render the township one of the most picturesque in the county.

The range of hills which runs through the eastern part of the State divides Sylvan into three sections, each differing in physical characteristics, the western undulating, the eastern more undulating, and the middle section composed of hill and dale. These miniature mountains of the last section are called the "Short Hills" by the inhabitants of the township. The western section has a more uneven surface than the eastern, the latter being almost a plain, presenting a wide range of beautiful farming country.

THREE CREEKS

drain the township. One of these rises in Mill lake, section 4, in the northern part of the township, and flows eastward, discharging itself into the county ditch in Lima township. Sylvan creek rises in the southwestern part of the township in a small lake in sec. 31, and flows northeasterly through Sylvan Center and Chelsea, its waters also being discharged into the county ditch. Mill creek rises on sec. 7 of Sharon, and runs along the southern limit of the township through Lima and finally empties into the Huron river at Dexter.

In the northwestern portion of the township is a cluster of lakes—Cedar, Doyle, Kavanaugh, Mill, Crooked, and several smaller ponds. Crooked lake is about a mile long, and is said to contain about the coldest water in Michigan, owing to the number of cold springs supplying it. There is no possible outlet, but the people suppose that the springs one mile north form one. Kavanaugh lake is nearly a mile in length. All these lakes abound in fish common to the region.

When the pioneers first visited Sylvan township they beheld a beautifully undulating country, gemmed in part with clear lakes, and diversified by a range of romantic hills, the surface covered with "oak openings," that did not stand too thickly to prevent the growth of the luxuriant blue-grass beneath. Owing to all those natural advantages, the hardships of the pioneer were ameliorated and the early settlers at once provided with feed for their stock and other necessities, which very much lessened the hazard of beginning life in the new country. Game and fish were abundant, herds of deer were constantly seen cropping the rich herbage of the hills and valleys, and made a novel and beautiful picture as they were seen amid the orchard of oaks feeding leisurely or careering swiftly amid the trees.

The custom of the pioneer farmer was to "break up" the soil while the oaks were yet standing, and afterward girdle the trees, which, dying, would permit the sun to reach the soil and promote the growth of crops. During the next season or two the trees would be removed and the land completely cleared. What a change! Nature in its wild state has given place to cultivated nature. The homesteads of civilized man dot the beautiful sections of the land and promise peace forever.

STORY OF SETTLEMENT.

From the reminiscences of early settlement, related by W. E. Depew, it is learned that five years after the first settler made his home in Lima, the township of Sylvan was yet without a white inhabitant. If the district could have been visited in 1830 it would have been our privilege to have seen the first white settler approaching the spot Oct. 18, 1830, where he was to make his home, and hew out of the forest a productive farm. We would have learned that the approaching man was Cyrus Beckwith. In that year he made his home in this township, built a house and moved his family from Ann Arbor. Mr. Beckwith's hired man, who helped to build his house and clear land in the following spring, was Wm. A. Begole.

After this beginning of a settlement settlers came in quite rapidly. In 1831 Jesse Smith selected his land and built his house; in the same year Elias H. Kelly located land, and in the following year built his house. In 1832 Henry Depew arrived.

THE VERMONT COLONY.

In 1832 a number of families from Addison county, Vermont, emigrated into the Territory of Michigan, and settled in Dexter township which at that time embraced the present townships of Manchester, Sharon, Sylvan, Lyndon, Lima, Freedom and Bridgewater. In this Vermont colony were Wm. A. Davis, Truman Lawrence and Orlo H. Fenn, all having families. They founded what was then, and has since been called, the Vermont Settlement. Stephen J. Chase and Nathan Pierce, from Ontario county, New York, came the same year. In the spring of 1833 Daniel Fenn, father of Orlo Fenn, and his family, arrived, as also did Tully Fenn; and in the fall Amos W. Davis and Dennis Warner were added to the population. In May, 1834, Mahlon Wines, Ira Spaulding, Sen., and Ira Spaulding, Jr., and families, arrived, and located land in the settlement. Joel B. Boyington came the same spring, exchanging farms with Stephen Chase. Wm. Begole also settled in the neighborhood, and was employed by Cyrus Beckwith as his first hired man, and as such, assisted Mr. Beckwith in erecting the first log house in the township. John M. Cummings, Arnold S. Bell, Thomas H. and Isaac Godfrey, Adonijah Godfrey and Elisha Congdon, all made beginnings in the township in 1834. About this time, or within three years thereafter, Azel Backus, Mahlon Beeks, Dr. Sears and Hugh Davidson arrived. Mr. Davidson established a hotel just east of the Short Hills. Alfred Holt came in 1834, and was the postmaster at Pierceville. John M. Cummings was a settler in 1834, and Arnold S. Bell, a school-teacher, located in the township the same year. Thos. H. and Isaac Godfrey, Adonijah Godfrey, and Elisha Congdon were comers about this time. The latter located on the spot where Chelsea now stands, owning the land on the east side of Main street, his brother owning the land on the west side of that thoroughfare that was to be.

On the west side of the Short Hills Edwin E. Conkling settled in 1832, and his first wife, Miss Hicox, named the township of Sylvan. Calvin Hicox was also an early settler on the west side of the Hills, as was also Joseph Peter Riggs. In 1832 Ira Spaulding had a small clearing, and Orlo H. Fenn, Stephen J. Chase, Truman Lawrence and Wm. A. Davis all had clearings of from three to ten acres. Otherwise the eastern half of the township was a wilderness, yet extremely beautiful. The Territorial road ran through the township, entering on the east by Nathan Pierce's farm, and passing through Sylvan Center. The same thoroughfare exists to-day. The north and south road, now running through the town from Chelsea to Manchester, was also a cut-out in 1832-'3. There was also a road leading to Bingham's mill, in Lima township; the early settlers having their sawing done at this mill. A line of stages, owned by S. B. Davis, ran through the township on the Territorial road. In 1832-'3 all mail for Sylvan settlers came to Dexter, and it taxed severely the pioneer's finances to raise the 25 cents necessary to pay the postage on a single letter. The second postoffice of the region was at Lima Center. There was a tavern at Sylvan Center, William Dunham being the landlord. In 1838 Elihu Frisbie opened the first store at the Center, and was followed in 1839 by Geo. Lord, who opened a general stock of goods, and in 1841 by J. C. Winans, who traded there until 1851. Previous to this period, however, a small grocery and saloon was kept by Joseph Perry. In the years following, Thomas H. Godfrey sold goods there.

In 1853 the first grist-mill on the creek was built, the money being raised principally by subscription. It is still standing, and doing duty for the farmers around the Center, operated by Orlando Boyd. In 1832, Hugh Davidson kept a hotel east of the Short Hills, and Andrew Murray entertained travelers one mile west of the Center, and displayed the sign, "Call and See!" Thomas Godfrey built a hotel here, and was landlord for several years.

Pierceville, at the junction of the north, south and Territorial roads, just south of the present village of Chelsea, on James Congdon's land, was a business center in 1834 and thereafter until the depot was located at Davidson Station, when the place was absorbed by the new village, and one after another the buildings were sold, moved away or torn down. When Pierceville was in its glory, a brother of John C. Winans, Stephen by name, had a store there. Albert C. Holt was the postmaster, and Dr. Stewart was the surgeon and physician; Israel Bailey was the blacksmith. Mr. Holt carried on a sash and blind factory. When the railroad came, and Mr. Congdon desired to divert business to Davidson Station, he bought out the Holt property, also the interest of Dr. Stewart, and Huldah Aldrich, a maiden lady; the buildings one by one disappeared until now there is not the slightest sign remaining of the once thriving hamlet.

The first death in the township was that of Mrs. Jesse Smith, whose demise gave occasion for the establishment of Vermont Cemetery. The first marriage was that of John C. Winans and Betsey M. Fenn.

The first postmaster was Calvin Hicox, at Sylvan Center.

ORGANIC.

In 1834 the settlers in the township had become so numerous that it was thought expedient to create a township organization, and accordingly on the first Monday in April the first election was held, which happened to be on the same day the first election was held in Lima tp. The act says, "That all that part of the county of Washtenaw comprised in surveyed township 2 south, in range 3 east, be a township by the name of Sylvan, and the first township meeting be held at the now dwelling-house of Samuel Dunham, in said township." In the following account of the meeting for organization it will be seen how faithfully the law was carried out and its conventionalities observed:

"The annual meeting of the town of Sylvan, on the first Monday of April, 1834, held at the house of Samuel Dunham, in said town, organized by choosing Edmund E. Conkling Moderator, and Stephen J. Chase, Clerk of said meeting. The moderator and clerk, after being sworn, proceeded to open the meeting, and the following officers were elected in said town: Nathan Pierce, Supervisor; Elisha Congdon, Town Clerk; Stephen Chase, Orlo Fenn and Edward E. Conkling, Assessors; Calvin Hicox, Constable and Collector; Daniel Fenn and Samuel Dunham, Overseers of the Poor; Truman Lawrence, M. Medcalf and Asahel Backus, Commissioners of Highways; Nathan Pierce and Edmund E. Conkling, Road Masters. It was voted that the overseer of roads be fence viewer; Thomas H. Godfrey, Samuel Dunham and Edward E. Conkling, Commissioners of Common Schools; Nathan Pierce, John R. Jewett, Truman Lawrence, John C. Winans and Edmund E. Conkling, Inspectors of Common Schools. It was resolved at this meeting, that the next annual town meeting should be held at the house of Hugh Davidson. The minutes were signed the 7th day of April, 1834, by Edward E. Conkling, Moderator, and Stephen J. Chase, Clerk."

The records of 1835 can not be found, and therefore the account of township meeting is not given.

At the first town meeting Edmund E. Conkling, at the suggestion of his wife, gave the township the name that it now bears.

At the annual election in April, 1836, Alfred C. Holt, Lewis Powell, Cyrus Beckwith and Mahlon Wines were elected Justices of the Peace. Before these courts were established in the wilderness, no lawyer with legal technicality appeared; the voice of the advocate was not heard by them, and they were left to administer such simple justice as to them seemed meet. Nathan Pierce held the office until 1837; Mahlon Wines, Elisha Congdon, Azel Backus. From this period the following have served as

VERMONT CEMETERY.

This, the oldest burial-place in Sylvan tp. originated as follows : In 1835 Mrs. Jesse Smith died, her death being the first in the township. At that time no ground had been set apart for the burial of the dead, and the fact that mortality would thenceforth certainly claim his victims among the settlers, perhaps for the first time rested on their minds, and they came to the conclusion that a cemetery was needed in their midst. Aaron Lawrence, who owned land on a corner east of Orlo Fenn's farm, sec. 24, offered to give a parcel of ground for a burial place, reserving a lot for his own family. The remains of Mrs. Smith were deposited here, and thus the spot was consecrated as the resting place of the dead. Afterward a Cemetery Association was formed for the government of the grounds, and additions were made to the allotment. Since that period one acre has been added, making a total area of two acres. It is the resting place of nearly all the pioneers of Sylvan as well as many of their descendants.

THE TOWNSHIP SCHOOL.

A local chronicler gives the following account of the organization of the first school district in the township. Having a belief that the free-school system must be a part of the infant settlement, the pioneers organized the first school district in the township, and built a school-house a little south of the residence of Stephen J. Chase. The one who was called to do the first school-teaching in the township was Miss Harriet Wines, sister of Charles H. Wines, and afterward Mrs. D. Warner.

There are at present five whole and three fractional districts in the township, the present directors of which are as follows: No. 2, Philip Schweinfurth; No. 3, W. E. Depew; No. 4, Christian Weber; No. 5, Michael Foster; No. 6, James Rigger; No. 7, Geo. W. Boynton; No. 10, Michael Savage; No. 11, Truman W. Baldwin.

Number of pupils attending school, 533; number of teachers employed, 25; value of school property, $20,000; amount expended for school purposes in 1880, $6,086.72.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF SYLVAN.

This was founded in 1833, and was named the "First Baptist Church of Christ." The following is a transcript of the original record of organization:

"Territory of Michigan, town two, range four east (Lima), July 5, 1833. The Baptist professors of Christ assembled at the school-house in the south part of 2d town, county of Washtenaw, and was organized as a Church of Christ. Sermon by Elder Twiss, who also gave the right hand of fellowship, then being a member of the Michigan Baptist Association. The members that presented letters were as follows: Benjamin Danielson, Daniel Fenn, T. C. P. Fenn, Orlo H. Fenn, Luther Chipman, Calvin Chipman, Mrs. Eunice Danielson, Mrs. Huldah Fenn, Mrs. Sally Gage, Mrs. Fanny Hammond, Mrs. Euseba Chipman, Mrs. Celinda Chipman, Miss Ruth Eastman, Mrs. Betsey Ann Fenn,—14 in all.

The meetings of the infant Church were first held in a log school-house, at Bingham's Mill, the first pastor being Elder Benjamin Danielson. Afterward meetings were held in a frame school-house. In 1851 it was decided to locate the services of the Church at Sylvan Center, and meetings were held there in a school-house.

In 1849, under the pastoral labors of Rev. Luther Powell, the Church was re-organized, or at least placed on a new foundation. In 1851 the church building which now stands at Sylvan and has latterly been used by the Methodists, was erected, the first pastor located there being Rev. Mr. Hosford, who served the Church as minister for nine years. Mr. Hosford's successor was Rev. H. M. Gallup, of Grass Lake, who for three years preached at Sylvan on Sunday afternoons. The next pastor was Rev. Mr. De Land, who served about three years. He was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Brown, who remained until Rev. J. C. Armstrong became pastor of both the Sylvan and Chelsea Churches. During his incumbency, in 1871, the church building in Sylvan was sold to the Methodists, nearly all the membership of the Baptist Church joining the Chelsea organization. This event closed the history of the Baptist Church in Sylvan.

AGRICULTURAL RESOURCES.

The area of improved lands in the township is 12,577, and unimproved 7,681 acres, giving a total acreage of 20,262, laid off into 163 farms.

In May, 1880, there were 3,041 acres planted in wheat. The year previous 3,719 acres, sown with the same cereal, yielded 75,100 bushels, averaging 20.19 per acre; 1,379 acres in corn produced 96,805 bushels; 667 acres in oats yielded 25,688 bushels; 69 acres in barley gave 1,754 bushels; 427 acres in clover yielded 730 bushels of seed; 2,410 acres of meadow produced 3,027 tons of hay; and 102 acres in potatoes gave 7,512 bushels, being less than half the number which the soil is capable of producing under the rude cultivation, as applied by the Anishinabes of the pre-American pioneer. A statement made by the Pepins and sustained by the Godfreys of olden times, if it may be relied upon, records a little tract of land, about an acre in extent, yielding 150 bushels of potatoes.

HISTORY OF CHELSEA.

The nucleus of Chelsea was formed about two miles west of the present village. When the old strap-rail line of the Michigan Central railroad was finished through the township, a station was established near the farm of Hugh Davidson, and it took the name "Davidson Station," from the circumstance. The little business center at this point received the sobriquet "Gunnstown," from the fact that a man familiarly known as "Old Gunn" lived there. At first the station was a mere stopping place for trains, and not till 1848 was there a station-house erected, and then the structure was a rough affair. The track repairer was the station agent, and added to his other duties the function of wood-sawyer for the road. The first agent that occupied this nondescript position was Thos. J. Davis, and he was followed by the Davidson brothers, who added a horse car to their facilities for doing the work along the track. Elisha Congdon was the first grain-buyer at Davidson Station, and James Seeley sold goods there at the same time, but finally sold out to Mr. Congdon. In the fall of 1848 the station was burned, probably fired by an incendiary. On account of the fact that the Manchester and northern trade could be more conveniently accommodated at Chelsea, the railroad company decided to establish the station for Sylvan township at this point, which was then jocosely called "Kedron," because a creek ran near the locality. The two Congdons, Elisha and James, owned the land where the station was to be established, and took an active interest in the promotion of the scheme, which they saw plainly would result in the growth of a town.

The Chelsea station was built in 1850, and the first station agent was one Finn. Elisha Congdon then lived in a frame house, where the family mansion was afterward erected (now McKone house). It was the first house in the place. The same building now stands on the east side of Main st., corner of Church st., and is the home of Mrs. T. H. Godfrey and her daughter, Mrs. Butterfield. In the fall of 1850 Elisha Congdon built the first store in Chelsea. It was situated on the lot now occupied by the Taylor brothers, near the railroad, on the east side of Main st. In the fall of 1850 the town was platted by Elisha and James Congdon. The first named gentleman owned 160 acres on the east side of Main st., and the latter owned 300 acres on the west side of the same thoroughfare. The second business building erected in Chelsea, after the location of the depot, was a brick blacksmith shop, on the east side of Main street north of the railroad, built by C. H. Wines for Aaron Durand and Newton Robinson. In the same year, 1850, Asel S. Harris built a hotel and saloon on the company's land just south of the depot, which he kept open for several years afterward. John C. Winans, who was doing business as a merchant in Sylvan, in 1851 erected a barn on the lot where his residence now is, and his family lived therein while he built a dwelling. The same season he built a store on the corner of Middle and Main streets, where the Chelsea bank is now located. In 1852 or 1853 William Smith, from Dexter, built a store. Tom Hastings erected a business structure during the same year, and the Fenn brothers and Clark built stores in 1854. From that time the growth of the place was steady.

After Mr. Finn, the station agents were S. L. Sergeant, whose service began in 1851; Aaron Durand, who succeeded in 1854, then S. L. Sergeant again, who was followed by the present incumbent, William Martin. Thomas Godfrey came from Sylvan Center during these years, and built the Chelsea House, which is still standing and is used as a hotel, by Thomas Hoag. Lewis Randall was also among the first residents of the place, as was Newton Robinson. Edward Winter kept a saloon, as did Jack Whittington. Jacob Berry located in Chelsea in 1852, and built a small house, and, being a carpenter and builder, he was engaged in the erection of many of the first buildings of Chelsea. Elijah Hammond was another of the early builders. Mrs. Berry, widow of Jacob Berry, still lives in Chelsea.

The first death in the village was that of Lewis Backus, and the first birth was that of Eddie Sergeant.

Chelsea village is situated in the northeastern corner of Sylvan township, on the line of the Michigan Central railway, about 17 miles from Ann Arbor on the east, and 21 from Jackson on the west. It is thus well located for trade, and has a wide section of tributary country. It enjoys the reputation of being the largest produce market in the county. It is said that more wool is shipped from Chelsea than from any other one place in the State, while the grain, apple, stock and meat shipments are very large. The produce dealers of Chelsea are a wide-awake and enterprising class of men, and pride themselves in giving such prices as shall divert trade to their market. The activity and large amount of the produce business of Chelsea, as a natural consequence, makes it a thriving mercantile point, and never was there a place of the size that contained so many and well-stocked stores of all kinds. It is remarked that the merchants and their clerks are scarcely ever idle. With the exception of a day of exceedingly dubious weather, Main and Middle streets are thronged with farmers' teams, and the stores of these thoroughfares crowded with customers.

The general appearance of Chelsea is that of thrift and good taste. It covers the slopes and crown of a gentle eminence; its streets are well graded; sidewalks have been generally laid on all the principal business and private streets, and all the business houses and dwellings bear evidence of the recent growth of the place in newness, neatness and modern style of architecture. The several church edifices, the histories of which are elsewhere given, are sufficiently commodious to accommodate the church-going people of the village, while their interiors are finished and furnished with elegance. The village also rejoices in an excellent school under the charge of the present able principal, Prof. Parker.

ADVENT OF THE M. C. R. R.

Chelsea was without a passenger depot until recently, and the villagers and their friends were much gratified when the new and elegant station was opened to the traveling public in December, 1880. The depot, though not so magnificent as that of Jackson, excels it in architectural beauty, and is therefore one of the prettiest railroad buildings in the State.

The population of the village is about 1,200; and the fact that every house and tenement is occupied, and the application for further accommodations constant and pressing, indicates a further and rapid growth. The present condition of Chelsea is most satisfactory, and its future as promising as the most interested property-holder can desire. Never was there a place of its size which contained a better class of citizens, so that its social status is of the very highest character. Permanency is built into its very foundation. The controlling element of its community is substantial, enterprising and moral, and there is not a thread of fustian woven into its business or social fabric. It is the model village of the county.

An interesting relic of the early history of Chelsea is a statement of the first shipment of goods on the primitive freight cars of the Central railroad, in the old strap-rail times. This document was found in an old account-book, which was discovered in the hands of a farmer in Lyndon, and now serves the purpose of a scrap-book. This first shipment was made on May 2, 1850, by M. P. Hutchins, and consisted of a single barrel of eggs, weighing 130 pounds, which was sent to consignees at Detroit. The next shipment was on the 6th, and consisted of two boxes, one shipped by Thomas G. Miller, and the other by the station agent. The freight from the station for the residue of the month would not make an hour's shipment at the present time.

RAILROAD ACCIDENTS IN VILLAGE AND TOWNSHIP.

Situated midway between Jackson and Ann Arbor as Chelsea is, the station here is the stopping place for the greater number of trains on the M. C. railway, and many of these pass each other here. Probably from this cause several deaths from railway accidents have occurred here. The most notable and shocking was that, in 1867, of Mrs. Wines, wife of Prof. Wm. Wines, then principal of the Chelsea Union school. Mrs. Wines was a teacher in the same school with her husband, and was returning home at noon across the track on East street, or the next crossing east, just as the noon express was approaching. A child cried to her, "Oh! don't cross now!" but she gaily replied, "I can cross easily enough," when her foot or dress caught on the track, the train rushed upon her, the cow-catcher struck her, throwing the unfortunate lady away from the track upon a fence, from which she rebounded, falling a mangled and quivering frame upon the ground. She lived in unconsciousness three or four hours and died.

A German baker was also killed near the station. He was on the train just arriving from Ann Arbor. Learning that the train would not stop at Chelsea, when it was running at full speed he made a fearful leap, and striking on his head, his brains were dashed out on the ground, killing him instantly.

Mrs. McNamara was another victim, who was killed by a train west of the station. P. Montague was also killed by a train while attempting to cross the track west of the station, as was also Gerald Crowley, about 1862.

THE MURDER OF JOHN C. DEPEW.

One dark deed has marked the annals of the township. This was the assassination of John C. Depew, an old and respected citizen, on the night of Sept. 10, 1863. Mr. Depew was at the time engaged in the sale of agricultural machines, in company with a man named Ebenezer Arnold. On the day of the murder he had sold machinery, and the proceeds, a considerable amount of money, he had on his person when he started for home in the evening, a short distance west of the village. He did not make his appearance at his dwelling that night, his family became alarmed in consequence, and the next day the town was thoroughly aroused, and a search was made for the missing man. It was evident that foul play had to do with the disappearance of the old pioneer. Not till the next Sunday, two or three days after Mr. Depew was missed, was the mystery unveiled. Then the searchers were shocked on finding the bruised dead body of their fellow citizen secreted in a dense growth of weeds, near the railroad track, a short distance west of the depot. The head had been crushed in on one side by some blunt instrument, the blow causing death. A coroner's inquest into the case was held before Justice Geo. W. Turnbull, and a verdict rendered according to the facts. Several parties were suspected and placed under arrest. Among them was Geo. Cleveland, who was tried, and, on the testimony of a woman, supposed to be a harlot, was convicted of murder, and sentenced to imprisonment for life. Cleveland went to the penitentiary, but did not remain long before he was pardoned out by Gov. Austin Blair, on Cleveland's proving an alibi, showing that at the time the murder was committed he was with his regiment in Chicago. Many conjectures were indulged by the citizens of Chelsea as to who the guilty party or parties were, and there are those in the village still who think the assassins could be named if that only were necessary to bring them to justice.

THE FIRE-FIEND'S DEEDS.

Chelsea has during its history been visited by two devastating fires. The first occurred in April, 1870, and swept away the entire row of buildings on the west side of Main street, between Middle street and the railroad. The fire caught in Geo. Rule's tailor shop, over Wood Bros.' store and thence communicated to the entire block. The structures being of wood, no effort could save them. The present row of fine stores was soon erected on the site of the burned buildings, which much improved the appearance of the street. In February, 1871, James Hudler's store was burned, and though situated in the midst of the new row of buildings, the contiguous walls were so well constructed, and the efforts of the citizens were so prompt and energetic, that the fire was checked before it had seriously damaged the adjoining stores.

In November, 1876, another destructive fire occurred in Chelsea, which burned all that portion of the east side of Main street between Middle street and the Chelsea House. The buildings here were also of wood, and the fire raged unchecked until the destruction was complete. The fire originated in a saloon situated in the midst of the block. This burned district was also soon covered with substantial brick buildings, furnishing the village with a number of elegant and commodious stores.

PRESIDENTS OF THE VILLAGE.

In 1870 the official records of Chelsea village were burned in the fire that consumed the west side of Main street, and it has been found impossible to recover a full list of presidents and clerks from the time of organization till 1870. Elisha Congdon was the first president of the village and the distinction of being second president is disputed between Reuben and C. H. Kempf. The following is a list of presidents of the corporation from 1870 to 1880: David Thomas, 1870-'2; Reuben Kempf, 1873; Orrin Thatcher 1874-'5; Geo. W. Turnbull, 1876; Samuel G. Ives, 1877; G. W. Turnbull, 1878-'9; James P. Wood, 1880; James L. Gilbert, 1881.

CLERKS OF THE VILLAGE.

The following is the list of village clerks for the same period: G. J. Crowell, 1870-'1; J. H. Stype, 1872-'4; H. A. Smith and James Taylor, 1875; Edward McNamara, 1876; C. C. Babcock, 1877; H. A. Smith, 1878; C. H. Robins, 1879-'80; Gilbert Gay, 1881.

OAK GROVE CEMETERY.

This beautiful city of the dead is an evidence of the culture, taste and refinement of the citizens of Chelsea, and especially of the high qualities of the ladies, through whose efforts the money to defray the expense of improving the cemetery grounds was secured. Oak Grove Cemetery was established in September, 1860. During the 20 and a half years which have elapsed since that time, 110 lots have been sold and about 100 used for burial, averaging but five lots sold during each year, so few being a striking evidence of the healthfulness of the district. The names of the organizers appearing on the record book of the cemetery are as follows: J. W. Green, Curran White, H. E. Francisco, Elisha Congdon, G. W. James, F. M. Hooker, John W. Smith, Geo. Barnes, Isaac Denman, James Thompson, Chas. H. Kempf, Wm. Doyle, Jacob Berry, W. W. Whedon, John Letts, D. C. Hurd, W. F. Hatch, T. R. Gorton, Thos. Leach, S. Y. Denton, James Backwith, S. S. Sergeant, Henry Camfield, B. J. Tuttle, Lewis Winans, Albert Sons, Thos. S. Sears, E. Lowe, J. S. Harlow, T. T. Royce, Dr. R. B. Gates, E. Hammond, E. Beach, R. Martin, M. M. Boyd, Charles Congdon, D. Maroney, M. Millspaugh.

The present officers are James S. Gilbert, President; Aaron Durand, Treasurer; Geo. P. Glazier, Clerk; Charles Congdon, Sexton; Thos. S. Sears, E. L. Noyes, Jas. P. Wood, Heman S. Holmes Charles H. Kempf and Wm. H. Calkins (deceased), Trustees.

Recently an important addition has been made to the improvements of Oak Grove Cemetery, in the shape of a receiving vault. This is a solid structure, built entirely of field stone, and is of sufficient size to hold 20 caskets or more. The interior of the vault is well finished; it is well ventilated, and enclosed by massive iron doors. The masonry of this vault is probably not excelled by any work of the kind in the State, the entire arch being formed of field stone, broken in keystone shape. This little, though valuable work was carried out by Grant & Nelson, at a cost to the proprietors of about $800.

The cemetery grounds are well kept, the drive-ways and walks arranged with a view to convenience as well as propriety, and the various groves so selected and planted by the botanist, that wherever the eye of the visitor is cast a beautiful vista presents itself for admiration, leaving nothing to remind him of a necropolis save the tell-tale marble. The monuments bespeak the character of the people: on every terrace there may be seen a magnificent tribute to departed worth, a work of the sculptor's hands, which time itself will scarcely cause to fade away. Such is the quiet home of those who have gone up higher—the pioneers and their children who died in the village of their adoption or nativity.

SCHOOLS.

The first school after the village began to grow was in a building near the present Congregational Church, and taught by W. F. Hatch. In 1854 a house was built on the corner of West South and Middle streets, which was used for school purposes till 1860. This is now occupied as the residence of Heman Woods. In that year the brick Union school-house was erected, on the corner of East and East South streets. Elisha Congdon was the contractor, and built the house for $5,000, though its actual cost was $6,000, he contributing $1,000 from his own funds. In 1875 an addition was made to the structure, at a cost of $3,000. In 1880, the number of pupils having become so large that further accommodations were necessary, a small house for the primary department was built adjacent to the larger building. The accommodations for the various departments of the school are ample, the rooms well furnished, the high school provided with chemical and philosophical apparatus, etc. The principals of the Union school from the period of its dedication comprise among others, Professors Macomber, Van Cleve, Wm. Wines, W. C. Hill, Wm. M. Osband, Willetts Hill, George Brown, J. K. Davis, N. A. Richards and P. M. Parker, the present principal.

CHURCHES.

Congregational Church of Chelsea.—The record of this Church shows its organization in the Vermont settlement to be completed March 21, 1835, under the name of the Presbyterian Church of Sylvan. The meeting was opened by the prayer of the Rev. Mr. Bouton. The Rev. Mr. Beach presided, with Mahlon Wines the appointed scribe. The articles of faith, covenant and practice adopted by the Presbytery of Monroe, February, 1834, and recommended for adoption to the Churches under their care, being presented by the chairman, was read by him and carefully considered by the persons present. They petitioned the Presbytery to appoint a committee to constitute them a Church, and resolved unanimously to adopt said articles then and there presented.

The members included Ira Spaulding, William A. Davis, John C. Winans, Obed Cravath, Alfred C. Holt, with Mrs. Chloe Spaulding, Abigail Davis, Hannah Cravath, Lucy Emline Cravath, Adaline L. Holt, Matilda Lawrence, Aun Wines, Lucy Davis, Harriet Warner, Sarah Beacon and Mehitable Preston.

On the motion of Mr. Wines, seconded by John C. Winans, it was voted to adopt the Presbyterian form of government, and constitute a Presbyterian Church. Voted by each member, giving him and her a vote personally, to the scribe to elect the following persons as elders in the Church: O. Cravath, M. Wines and Ira Spaulding. This completed the work of the meeting. This Church was the foundation of the present Congregational Church of Chelsea, which was organized about Christmas, 1849. For a time services were held about the neighborhood at school-houses, until the building of the church in 1851. Since reorganization the Church has rapidly progressed, and under the administration of Rev. Dr. Thomas Holmes, gives promise of attaining rare excellence among the Churches of the State. The value of church property is estimated at $4,500; the number of members is 150; the membership of the Sabbath-school about 200.

The ministers of the Congregational Church of Chelsea from the period of organization are named in order:

Reverends—Josephus Morton, Thomas Jones, Hiram Elmer, James F. Taylor, O. M. Thompson, Robert Hovington, Benjamin Franklin, D. F. Hathaway, Dr. Thomas Holmes.

The present officers comprise: Dr. Holmes, Pastor; John C. Winans, Horace Smith, Charles Easton, Deacons, with J. D. Crowell, Clerk; Thomas Wilkinson, C. H. Camp, Geo. A. Robertson, James L. Gilbert, Horace Baldwin, W. F. Hatch, Trustees; Thomas Wilkinson, Treasurer; George A. Robertson, Clerk; Rev. Dr. Thomas Holmes, Superintendent of Sunday-school.

The Methodist Episcopal Church of Chelsea was organized in 1853, by Rev. Mr. Hedger, who then preached in Lima, Rev. Ebenezer Steel, who is now superannuated, and resides in Ann Arbor, being the first regular pastor. The members of the first class were: Mr. and Mrs. M. M. Boyd, Mr. and Mrs. Fred A. Bowles, Mr. and Mrs. Jacob Berry, and perhaps one or two others. The pastors who succeeded Mr. Steel were Revs. E. P. Brockway, Charles Stringham, Manassa Hickey, Orrin Whitmore, Wm. Anderson, William Shire, Mr. May, Geo. Smith, Geo. Lowe, Wm. Leavington, David Casler, Wm. Holt, J. W. Campbell, D. Shire; Rev. J. L. Hudson being the present incumbent. At first, the services of the society were held in the Congregational church. The building of the present church edifice was begun in 1858, and finished in 1859. The first Sunday-school was organized in 1854, Silas Sergeant being the first Superintendent. The present class-leader is S. G. Ives, assisted by the pastor. The trustees are Leron Babcock, S. G. Ives, Milo Hunter, F. M. Hooker and James Rowe. The stewards are Charles Crane, A. Rodell, Geo. Whitaker, Mrs. Geo. P. Glasier and Mrs. Geo. Davidson. The pastor is superintendent of the Sunday-school.

The First Catholic Church of Sylvan was built about four miles northwest of Chelsea. It was a wooden structure, and the original building received two successive additions. It is now surrounded by a cemetery, where the Catholic dead are still interred. The first officiating priest in this locality was Rev. Father Hennessey, of Detroit. Rev. Father Cullen, of Ann Arbor, was probably the clergyman who founded the Church. Rev. John Van Genip, Pastor of the Dexter Church, held services for some time at the Chelsea church, built in 1869, which was a mission till 1848. Rev. Patrick Duhig became the permanent pastor, and has remained such since that time. During his incumbency the church has been modernized, a pastoral residence erected, and the grounds about both dwelling and church highly improved. The church edifice is of brick, 52 by 100 feet in superficial extent, with a 15-foot apse. It was built at a cost of $10,000 to $12,000. The pastor's house cost, including outbuildings and improvement of grounds, $4,000. The residence is a roomy, double two-story structure, and contains an office and private chapel, besides the other apartments common to a gentleman's dwelling. The Chelsea Church is composed of 130 families, and is in a flourishing condition.

The Baptist Church of Chelsea was organized at the residence of Dr. R. B. Gates, on April 28, 1868, by 19 constituent members. In June, the same year, Mr. Frank Everett was chosen deacon of the Church. Rev. H. W. Brown was the first pastor, and was succeeded by Rev. J. C. Armstrong, who began his labors Oct. 26, '68, and continued till Feb. 5, 1871. During his pastorate the present church edifice on Main street was erected at a cost of $6,000. During this time Milo Baldwin was elected one of the deacons of the Church. Rev. G. Meseleias succeeded Mr. Armstrong, closing his relation in August, 1872. In the following November Rev. L. C. Pettengill became pastor, and continued thus till 1874. In July a call was extended to Rev. William Bird, and in October he was ordained a pastor. He remained one year and during the succeeding year the pulpit was supplied by Rev. J. C. Armstrong, Rev. Messrs. Shepherd, Nelson, Abbott and Prof. Ten Brook. Rev. A. A. Hopkins was pastor during the summer of 1876, and directed the building of the parsonage. Nov. 19, 1876, a call was extended to Rev. E. A. Gay, who immediately entered upon his work, and has continued in the pastorate to the present time, being now in the fifth year of his service. Since the organization of the Church 136 members have united with it. During the year 1880 the church building was enlarged and embellished at an expense of over $1,000, and it is now a commodious and pleasant place of religious worship, a credit to Chelsea and to the congregation of Baptists.

ST. PAUL'S GERMAN LUTHERAN CHURCH.

The St. Paul's German Lutheran Church of Chelsea, was organized Feb. 2, 1868. The following were the originating members: G. Wackenhut, G. Herelschwerdt, M. Lehman, J. Bieler, F. Vogel, D. Faist, J. Schaible, G. Mast, I. Vogt, J. Schumacher, J. Morlock, F. Bresemle, J. Fahner, J. Scheffel, J. Schultz, A. Boose, F. Boose. The church building on Summit street was erected during the same year in which the Church was organized. Rev. J. Schladermund, of Waterloo, Jackson county, during the first few months held services in the new church once in two weeks, and in the fall of 1868 Rev. Tierk, from Waterloo, assumed pastoral charge of the Church; F. N. J. Wolf followed till 1871, conducting service once in two weeks until 1875, when Rev. M. Graupner assumed the pastorate. He, in 1877, was followed by Rev. Mr. Bunge, who remained till 1878, when the present pastor, Rev. M. Metzger, of Waterloo, became shepherd of the flock. There are at present 20 members in the congregation. The following are the names of the present trustees: J. Schutz, Fred Vogel and J. Hepfer.

OTHER SOCIETIES.

The order of Freemasons have one flourishing lodge in Chelsea. It is denominated Olive Lodge, No. 156. The records of the lodge were burned in one of the fires that have twice consumed portions of Main street, and a full history of the organization is not obtainable. The following is a list of the present officers of the Olive Lodge: M. J. Noyes, W. M.; J. D. Schaitman, S. W.; John A. Palmer, J. W.; T. E. Wood, Secretary; H. S. Holmes, Treasurer; H. M. Woods, S. D.; C. M. Davis, J. D.; B. Wight, Tyler. The lodge has a membership of 67, and at present meets in a hall over Hudler's store, Main street.

Vernor Lodge, I. O. O. F., was named after Benjamin Vernor, of Detroit, now Grand Treasurer of the Grand Lodge of the State. The records of the lodge were burned in the fire of 1876, so that a full history of the organization cannot be given. The lodge was founded March 31, 1861. The following are the names of the charter members: J. M. Congdon, J. Berry, A. Blackney, E. Hammond, D. Tompkins, A. Natten, and Stephen Sigfried. There are now 32 members of the lodge, officered as follows: A. F. Wooden, Noble Grand; John J. Wakenhaut, Vice-Grand; J. Schumacher, Treasurer; Geo. E. Wright, Secretary.

The German Workingmen's Benevolent Association of Chelsea was organized in 1872, incorporated in 1876, and united to the State association during the latter year. The capital of the association, including furniture, is $850. There are 40 members. The officers in 1880 were: Chas. Neuburger, President; Frank Staffan, Vice-President; W. Alber, Recording Secretary; Bernh Kramer, Corresponding Secretary; Fred Vogel, Cashier; Jacob Schumacher, Treasurer; Jacob Hepfer, F. Girsch and Geo. Mast, Trustees.

EXCELSIOR CORNET BAND.

Chelsea is not behind her sister cities and towns in support of that popular style of music, the cornet band. The Excelsior Cornet Band was organized Feb. 19, 1878. The original members were A. M. Congdon, E. E. Shaver, H. L. Wood, John C. Taylor, Chas. E. Chandler, J. A. Bachman, G. W. Bachman, John P. Foster, G. A. Lacey and A. M. Yocum. The members of the band are uniformed in dark blue, trimmed with white broadcloth, with brass buttons, the drum major's suit costing $100, and the uniforms of the entire band about $600. The instruments involved an expense of $275. The band has been generously assisted by the enterprising citizens of the village, and has repaid the pecuniary outlay by evincing a desire to please and entertain on all occasions.

CHELSEA BANK.

Chelsea Bank was organized under the general banking laws of Michigan. In August, 1868, Michael J. Noyes, of Chelsea, and Geo. P. Glazier, then recently of Parma, Jackson Co., Mich., formed a co-partnership under the style of Noyes & Glazier, for the purpose of conducting a banking exchange business in Chelsea. In December following they added to their other business that of dealing in drugs, a business in which Mr. Glazier had been engaged from boyhood. In April, 1871, Mr. Glazier purchased Mr. Noyes' interest in the firm, and for nine years continued the banking business successfully alone. During these years Dr. Armstrong was associated with Mr. Glazier in the drug business, under the style of Glazier & Armstrong, which firm is still conducting a prosperous trade. In January, 1880, a proposition was entertained to form a State bank, and at a meeting held to complete the necessary arrangements, the stock was all taken by nine individuals, and the new organization succeeded the banking business of Geo. P. Glazier. The following stock-holders are the present officers: Hon. S. G. Ives, President; Thos. S. Sears, Vice-President; Geo. P. Glazier, Cashier; who, with Luther James, Hon. A. T. Gorton, Waterloo, Mich., Heman T. Woods, of Woods & Knapp, Chelsea, are the directors. The bank has declared liberal semi-annual dividends, and its condition and management are excellent and very satisfactory, from the fact that 10 per cent. premium is offered for its stock, the original stock-holders manifesting no desire to part with it at that figure.

R. Kempf & Bro., bankers, established their financial house in 1876. They do a general banking business, and are on a substantial basis, with ample capital.

CHELSEA FOUNDRY AND MACHINE SHOP.

This industry is one of the oldest in the history of Chelsea. The land on which the buildings stand was conveyed by Government patent to Azel Backus. It has been successively transferred until it passed into the hands of L. Miller and Hiram Lighthall, the present owners. These gentlemen came into possession of the property in 1877, and largely improved it, adding to the capacity of the works for the foundry and machine shop business; in fact, converting the establishment into a busy manufactory. The company manufacture plows, agricultural implements and machinery, carriages and wagons. Connected with the works are a foundry, blacksmith shop, machinery, etc., which require the employment of several hands. An important feature of Miller & Lighthall's business is the production of the Chelsea plow, an invention which owes its existence to Mr. Miller's genius. It has an improved jointer and shin-piece, and is a great favorite with farmers who have become acquainted with its advantages. The sale of these plows is already large, though the patent was issued as late as Aug. 24, 1880, and they have been manufactured but a few months.

COMMERCIAL.

The produce business of Chelsea is its most important feature. The large quantity of farm products bought and shipped from this point has been elsewhere mentioned. The following dealers are largely engaged in this trade: Kempf Bros., Wood Bros., Taylor Bros., Loron Babcock and W. F. Hatch. Taylor Bros. and Babcock & Gilbert have elevators for the shipment of grain, while the stock-yards for the loading of cattle are ample.

The business interests of Chelsea are represented by the following firms: Dry goods and general merchandise—Thomas Wilkinson, established in 1864; Wood Bros., established in 1868; McKone & Healey, started in 1878; Parker & Babcock, commenced Jan. 15, 1880; and H. S. Holmes. Druggists—William Reed & Co., established in 1864; and Glazier & Armstrong. Grocers—Gilbert & Crowell, established in Jan., 1873; and Durand & Hatch who started in 1880. Hardware dealers—Bacon & Co., and P. Woods & Kuapp, who commenced business in 1874. Hotels—Chelsea House, conducted by Henry G. Hoag, and McKone House. Lumber—Wm. Bacon & Co., and Kempf Bros. Meat Markets—Henry C. Bach, established in 1871; Charles Vogel, and Miles Hunter, who started in business in 1863. Manufactures—Chelsea Mills, owned by Leaman Sparks, since 1879; Chelsea Planing and Cider Mill, built by Curran White in 1856, and now conducted by Edward L. Negus; Chelsea Tile Works, established in 1871, and owned by Orrin Thatcher; Chelsea Marble Works, established in 1879, by Augustus Neuburger; Frederick Vogel's carriage shops, established in 1865; Staffer Bros., wood working establishment; and Charles Steinbach, harness-maker; and blacksmith—Jacob Schumacher, established in 1870.

In closing this sketch of Chelsea it is just to state, that it takes precedence of all the other villages of Michigan in beauty of location and regularity of public and private streets, in the number of its churches, the efficiency of its Union school, and in the enterprise of its citizens. It has been said of this people, that they are noted for their eminent business abilities, and whatever they do or undertake to do is thoroughly done. This remark does not apply to business matters alone, but extends itself also to their rational modes of pastime and enjoyment. In the following pages, devoted to the personal sketches of the past and present prominent citizens of Sylvan township and Chelsea village, these characteristics of the people will become more evident.

Mr. Davis departed this life June 29, 1879. He was a member of the Congregational Church, and assisted in the organization of the first Presbyterian Church, in Sylvan tp. Mrs. Davis is spending the residue of her days on this earth with Mr. F. A. Prudens, a grand-son of her deceased husband.

He never arrived at his destination, and foul play being suspected, a search was made for him. Three days later his body was found near the western limits of Chelsea, concealed in a cluster of tall weeds. A coroner's jury decided that he came to his death by a blow received from a sling shot, or other blunt instrument, in the hands of an assassin. He left a wife and 5 children to mourn his sad and premature death.

William E. Depew, lawyer, Chelsea, and eldest son of John C. Depew, was born at Chelsea, Washtenaw county, Nov. 23, 1848. He was very successful, and adopting the missionary plan, traveled through Michigan, holding meetings everywhere, and founding societies of believers in the advent doctrines. In 1846 Edward entered the chemical department of Cambridge University, and was a student of the class under the tuition of Dr. Webster when that man killed the eminent Dr. Parkman, a tragedy that caused intense excitement all over the United States. He graduated from that venerable institution as a physician, and in 1852 began the practice of medicine at Hudson, Michigan. He ultimately became engaged in the drug business and office practice, which he continued for 11 years. Seeing the fast increasing tendency to evil in our land, he became persuaded that it was his duty to enter the ministry, which he did, uniting with the Baptist ministry, and was first assigned the charge of that denomination at Bronson, Michigan, where he remained four years. He was pastor at Plymouth, Wayne county, for three years, and in November, 1875, entered upon his duties at the beautiful village of Chelsea. During his pastorate the congregation has prospered exceedingly, and an improvement has been made to their church edifice, costing over $1,000. Rev. Mr. Glazier has 1 son, Frank, who has graduated with honors at the University of Michigan as a pharmaceutical chemist, and at Eastman's Commercial College, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and is now in Germany to acquire the German language and brush up in other studies, preparatory to taking an active interest in his father's business.

In 1831 he emigrated to Michigan and settled on Honey Creek, Scio tp., where he entered 80 acres of Government land, subsequently adding 40 acres more. At this time there were but few families living between Honey Creek and Ann Arbor. In 1834 Mr. Godfrey sold his farm and bought land in Sylvan tp., comprising 80 acres. Six years later he removed to Sylvan Center where he kept a tavern for many years. When he first located there he entertained his guests in a log house, but afterward erected a frame building. While a resident of Sylvan Center he worked at his trade, and also served the people of Sylvan tp. as Postmaster, Clerk and Justice of the Peace. About 1872, age compelled him to relinquish his business, and he settled at Chelsea, where he lived a retired life until the day of his death; this latter event occurred March 29, 1880. His children numbered 5, namely:—William M., a resident of California; David L., a farmer near Ann Arbor; Rebecca Jane, widow of Charles F. Butterfield (dec.), and a resident of Chelsea; and Henry B. and Alice Irene (deceased). Mr. Godfrey was a faithful member of the Congregational Church. He located at Fife Lake, Michigan in 1880, where he has since lived. Jennie is a teacher in the Chelsea Union school.

Lettice Smith Holmes, wife of Rev. Thomas Holmes, D. D., and eldest daughter of Asa L. and Syrena Smith, was born May 8, 1823, at Rochester, N. Y. On the day Lettice was one year old, her parents left Rochester, and on the 29th of May, 1824, they reached the new settlement of Ann Arbor. Mrs. Smith was the second white woman and Lettice the first white child in the settlement. Her educational advantages were only such as a frontier settlement could afford. Her mother taught her the rudiments of reading and spelling. Conspicuous among her early instructors were Miss Mary Page, Miss Abby Moseley, Moses Merrill, Mr. Griffith, who taught the academy, Miss Eliza Page, and, last of all, Mr. and Mrs. John N. Gott. In November, 1842, she went to Oberlin, Ohio, and commenced preparation for college, and one year later, having accomplished the work of two college years in 12 months, entered the freshman class. No "shorter course" could satisfy her ambition, and four years later, having completed the full classical course, she graduated and received the degree of A. B. On the 14th of October, of the same year, 1847, she was married to Rev. Thomas Holmes, a classmate, spent the winter teaching in Plymouth, Richland Co., O., and, the following spring, desiring to pursue a course of theological study at Oberlin, with her husband, was granted class privileges, though ladies were not admitted to membership in the theological department. At the end of three years, 1850, this course completed, she took the second degree, A. M., and the same fall accompanied her husband to Portsmouth, N. H. Nothing of interest occurred here outside the routine of a pastor's wife. In 1853, her husband having accepted a professorship, in Antioch College, Yellow Springs, Ohio, she accompanied him thither. The next year, at the opening of the fall term, she obtained an appointment to teach Latin and some other branches in the preparatory department, which position she held one year. On the 24th day of May, 1856, she took passage for Europe, and joined her husband, who had then been a year on the continent. Meeting at Dover, England, they crossed the channel to Ostend, and traveling through Bruges, Ghent, Brussels (spending one day on the field of Waterloo), Maline, Aix la Chapelle and Cologne, arrived at Berlin on the 20th, where she spent the summer, studying the German language, visiting museums and making excursions to some other places. The month of September was spent in journeying from Berlin to Geneva, Switzerland, visiting Dresden, Erfurt, Frankfort-on-the-Main, passing down the Rhine to Bonn and returning to Mannheim, thence to Heidelberg, Baden Baden, Strasbourg, Basel, Schaffhausen, Constance, Zurich, the Rigi, Lucerne, crossing the Alps by the Brunig Pass to Berne, thence to Geneva.

From Oct. 4, 1856, until Aug. 25, 1858, Mrs. Holmes resided at Geneva, pursuing French and oil painting, and making excursions to neighboring places of interest.—Chamouni, Mt. Blanc, St. Bernard and Lyons, and spending two weeks in Paris. On the date above mentioned she left Geneva and stopping at intervening cities for sight-seeing, reached Dusseldorf on the Rhine, on the 30th purposing to spend some time there under the instructions of Herr Leutze, or some other distinguished master of painting. Not finding opportunities as advantageous as she expected, she immediately retraced her steps as far as Bonn and placed herself under the tuition of Herr Joseph Leiendecker. Nine months and a half were spent in this old university city, in intense application to painting and German, under circumstances most favorable and advantageous. In June, 1859, Mrs. Holmes left Bonn, "did the Rhine" the fourth time, and made her way to Stuttgart, via Mainz, Frankfort-on-the-Main, Heidelberg and Bruchsal. Three months were spent there pursuing German and visiting neighboring villages, chief among which was Marbach, the early home of Schiller. From Stuttgart she proceeded via Ulm to Munich.

In this magnificent capital of Bavaria, surrounded by wonders of art, and enjoying facilities for the study of art afforded by few European cities, about 11 months were spent in close application. The principal excursions made from Munich were one to the quaint, old city of Nuremberg, including Ratisbon and the Walthalla, and one to the Tyrol, going by the way of Oberammergau to witness the Passion Play in 1860.

Bidding a reluctant farewell to Munich on the 4th of September, 1860, she hastened to Paris, simply calling at Augsburg, Eslingen, Stuttgart and Strasbourg, each a few hours, on the way, and reaching Paris on the 7th. Two months were spent in Paris, at this time, in viewing the city and its suburbs. In November she went again to Geneva, where she remained until the following July, when she set out to visit Rome and Naples before returning to America. Crossing the Simplon, she proceeded as far as Milan, but deeming it imprudent to go farther, on account of the overpowering heat of the season, she returned via Turin and Mt. Cenis to Geneva. Painting and French occupied her here until October, when she turned her thoughts and footsteps once more toward her native land. Stopping at Paris about two months more, on the 11th of December she sailed from Havre in the Steamship Arago. The Arago reached New York on the evening of December 26. Mrs. Holmes took steamboat the next afternoon for Fall River, Mass., where she joined her husband the following morning, Dec. 28, 1861. After three years and a half of quiet and rest, spent in Fall River, she accepted a chair in Union Christian College, Merom, Ind., and in September, 1865, entered upon her duties. Here she distinguished herself as Professor of Latin, French and German for nine successive years. Toward the close of 1875, she returned once more to the home of her childhood, and has since resided in Washtenaw county—since 1877 in Chelsea.

Rev. Thomas Holmes, D. D., pastor of the Congregational Church, Chelsea, was the oldest of 12 children of Burroughs and Polly (Denison) Holmes, and was born at Royalton, Niagara county, N. Y., November 24, 1817. He had only moderate opportunities for education in his youth, attending only winter schools after he was 12 years of age. At the age of 16 he mastered Day's Algebra in three months, and the next winter, 1834-'5, attended a select school at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., and studied Gibson's Surveying.

The following winter he taught school in the town of Malta, Saratoga county, N. Y. This was the first of 14 successive winters, spent in teaching common, ungraded schools, one winter in New York, six in Michigan (five of which were in Washtenaw county, and four of these in Ann Arbor), and seven in Ohio. During the summer of 1836, he was one of a corps of civil engineers employed in running a railroad line from Saratoga Springs to Whitehall, and in November of the same year emigrated to Michigan.

The date of the first farewell to mother and home is not definitely remembered; but, traveling by rail as far as Utica, N. Y., the western terminus of railroad travel at that time, by canal from that point to Buffalo, and by the old Steamer Monroe up Lake Erie, he landed in Detroit on Sunday morning, Nov. 20, 1836. The roads at that time were in a condition so nearly impassable that the 24th, the 19th anniversary of his birth, was spent at Ten Eyck's, 10 miles from Detroit, and on the 25th a very successful journey brought him through Plymouth Corners and Northville, and about one mile farther to the cabin of his Uncle Rosekrans Holmes, where he was received with a hearty welcome.

During the winter he taught a school about a mile south of his uncle's, and, in March, made his way to Ann Arbor, preparatory to the commencement of labor on his father's farm in Pittsfield, as soon as the opening spring would permit.

After about four years, a small part of which was spent on the farm in Pittsfield, and the major portion teaching in Ann Arbor, in July, 1841, Mr. Holmes went to Oberlin, Ohio, for the purpose of taking a course of classical and theological study. Nine years were spent in this laudable undertaking; two in the preparatory department, four in college, and three in the study of theology. The degree A. B. was received in 1847, that of A. M. in 1850.

On the 14th of October, shortly after graduating from college, Mr. Holmes was married to Miss Lettice Smith, oldest daughter of Asa L. Smith, of Ann Arbor. Miss Smith had also just received the degree A. B., having been his class-mate in college.

In 1853 Mr. Holmes was chosen Professor of Greek in Antioch College, Ohio. From April, 1855, until August, 1857, he spent studying and traveling in Europe. A portion of this time he attended lectures in the universities at Bonn and Berlin.

The principal places and countries visited were London, Paris, Brussels, the Rhine, from Cologne to Mannheim, Berlin, Hamburg, Dresden, Switzerland, Italy, from Milan and Venice in the North to Naples and Pompeii in the South. As President of Union Christian College, Meiom, Sullivan county, Indiana, he served from 1865 to 1875.

Mr. Holmes' first attempts at preaching were made in the winter of 1843-'4 while he was teaching in Ontario, Richland Co., Ohio. He received license from a Christian Church in Sheffield, Lorain Co., Ohio, on June 1; was admitted into the Huron Christian Conference in October, and was ordained November 3 of the same year. From this time until his health failed, in 1875, no opportunity to hold forth the word of life was ever refused by him, though for many years he received but little for it by way of pecuniary remuneration. During the six years, that remained of his student life at Oberlin, the record stands: 1845, preached 63 times; 1846, 54 times; 1847, 27 times; 1848, 48 times; 1849, 117 times; 1850, previous to graduation, Aug. 23, 141 times; subsequently 34 times; total, 175 times. January 1, 1851, he accepted a call from the Pleasant Street Christian Church, Portsmouth, N. H. (having served them as supply about two months), to become their pastor. This relation continued until September, 1853, when he, with great reluctance, resigned this charge to accept the Greek professorship in Antioch College, Ohio. On returning from Europe, August, 1857, Mr. Holmes found his old Church at Portsmouth without a pastor, and, declining to resume his position in Antioch College on account of changes that had taken place in its management, he accepted the unanimous call of the Church, and entered upon his duties as their pastor, October 4. Here he remained until the last Sabbath of September, 1859, just two years, when, on account of failing health, caused by the absence of his wife in Europe, he resigned his pastoral charge and entered the field as an evangelist. Within the next 181 days he preached 207 times, and saw many souls converted to Christ. In April, 1860, he entered into an arrangement with four Churches in the State of New York, where he had labored as an evangelist, viz.: at Warnerville, Barnerville, Quaker Street, Scholarie Co., and Wright, Albany Co., to preach in each place on each alternate Sunday. The extreme distance between these churches was 20 miles, with two churches at each extreme sufficiently near together to be reached on the same day. With these Churches Mr. Holmes labored, performing most of his travels on foot, and preaching in school-houses and churches outside of these limits on week day evenings, until the last of November, 1861. Anticipating the return of his wife from Europe in a few weeks, which would remove the necessity of a nomadic life to drive away the blues, he then accepted an invitation from the Franklin Street Christian Church, Fall River, Mass., to visit them, with a view to a settlement with them, and commenced his labors amongst them on the first Sabbath of December. The trial resulted in a settlement as pastor; his wife reached home on the 28th of the same month, and he soon found himself pleasantly situated, a happy and contented man once more. In June, 1865, being chosen President of Union Christian College, this charge was resigned, and, in August, Mr. Holmes moved to Indiana. Within the 10 years of his labors at Merom, the seat of the college, he served the Church as pastor and did a great deal of preaching besides through Indiana, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan and New York.

In 1875, with nervous energies thoroughly prostrated by excessive and continuous labor, care and anxiety, he resigned this situation, retired from all active and responsible service, found a home with his youngest brother on a farm in Pittsfield near Ann Arbor, and gave himself to quiet, ease, pure air and sunshine, committing the question of life or death entirely to the will of Providence. Under these favorable circumstances, it soon became apparent that his vital forces were still capable of recuperation; and, in April, 1877, he yielded to an earnest and pressing request of the Congregational Church in Chelsea to supply their pulpit half of the time for a few months. Remarkably, as it seemed to him, the improvement of his health, scarcely perceptible before, became decided and rapid from the commencement of these occasional labors. In July following, the Church gave him a formal call to settle with them, and, on the first of September, 1877, his services as pastor commenced. Since that time Mr. Holmes' relations with his people have been very cordial and happy, and the Church has prospered under his labors. His health, also, has greatly improved, and, to all appearances, he possesses vital force and physical soundness sufficient for another decade of active, efficient, and successful labor. A portrait of Dr. Holmes appears in this volume.

Milo Hunter, proprietor meat market, Chelsea, was born at Sharon, Litchfield Co., Connecticut; is the youngest son of Nathaniel and Rhoda (Peck) Hunter parents of 9 children—Joel, Harriet, Sybil, Sarah, Rhoda, Eliza, Olive, Waite P. and Milo. Six of these children are married, and residents of Michigan. When Milo was seven years old his parents removed to Sharon tp., this county, taking up 80 acres of Government land, where Milo resided until he was 34 years of age; he then removed to Chelsea, and engaged in the meat business in 1863, which he has followed since, with the exception of five or six years spent in the grocery trade. In 1858 he married Sarah L. Smith, of Sharon tp. They have 4 children—Lena, Clara S., Arthur M. and Hattie A., all residing with their parents. Mr. Hunter is a member of the M. E. Church, of Chelsea, in which body he officiates as Trustee.

Hon. Samuel G. Ives, of Chelsea, was born at Lansing, Tompkins county, N. Y., Dec. 21, 1812. From early childhood he was taught to depend upon his own exertions, which fact accounts for the success that has followed all of his undertakings through his long and eventful career. When of age he was in possession of only the rudiments of an education, and his entire fortune consisted of a "running horse," valued at $100. In the fall of 1834, he exchanged this horse for 80 acres of land, in what is now called Unadilla tp., Livingston Co., Mich. This land was owned by S. W. Holmes, now a resident of Scio tp. On March 17, 1835, with high hopes and youthful ambition, on foot and alone, Mr. Ives started for his future home, which he finally reached after days of danger and privation. The site was selected for a building, and a log house, 16x20 feet square, was soon "rolled up," arrangements for clearing four acres of ground and planting it in wheat were made, and Mr. Ives returned to the land of his birth. On Aug. 30, 1835, he married Maria Louisa, daughter of Hon. Josiah Hedden, of Lansing, N. Y., and Oct. 6 following, they bade adieu to the scenes of early childhood, with all their hallowed influences, for the home in the "far West." In their new home they were to see the tall unbroken forests swept away, and in their stead the waving fields of golden grain; to see the winding trail of the dusky savage transformed into a broad highway of thrifty commerce; to see the ever moving waters of the beautiful streams, which for ages had borne the rude canoe of the lone Indian, turning the wheels of industry, and aiding in the development of the country and its resources; here for nearly 40 years they toiled together, in sunlight and in shadow, and under the smiles of a kind Providence, whose overruling power was ever recognized, they were abundantly blessed in basket and in store. Eight children were the fruits of their wedded life, 7 of whom grew to maturity; 5 are still living. All are married, in pleasant circumstances, following honorable pursuits, and located within a circuit of a few hours' ride. The companion of his youth, the mother of his children, who was the sharer of his joys and sorrows, a helpmeet in truth, departed this life, Oct. 4, 1871, and now sleeps untroubled by the evils and afflictions of this life, in Williamsville cemetery, in Livingston county, Michigan. Hospitable and liberal, Mr. Ives' home was for many years the home of the itinerant minister of the gospel, and Collins, Smith, Pilcher, Bigelow and scores of others found here a hearty welcome and a happy fireside. Nearly a dozen churches, within a radius of as many miles from his old home, have received from him, in the course of their erection, substantial aid and encouragement. To him is due, perhaps, more than to any other, the credit for the erection of the M. E. church at Williamsville, in 1853. For nearly 30 years Mr. Ives has been a prominent member of that denomination, and the molding influence of his life, in favor of morality, temperance and religion will live and be felt long after he has been laid at rest beside his beloved wife.

Mr. Ives has been called to fill many positions of public trust, and in 1844-'5, was elected Justice of the Peace. He was elected in 1854 to represent Livingston county in the Michigan Legislature, and re-elected in 1856, also serving an extra session. He was the first Republican ever elected to that office from Livingston county. Though not a public speaker, yet by his earnest, forcible manner of argument he became an effective and distinguished Legislator, enjoying the full confidence of his political opponents. In 1874 he was unanimously nominated State Senator for his district, but owing to a complication of circumstances, peremptorily declined the proffered honor. He was a Presidential elector in 1872, and in 1874 appointed by Gov. Bagley, a Commissioner for the Insane Asylum at Pontiac, and proved a very efficient member of the board during the erection of the building. He still retains the position. In 1875 he was appointed a Trustee of the latter named institution. In all his political aspirations Mr. Ives never once suffered defeat. At the outbreak of the late war he was instrumental in raising troops, and forwarding supplies to the brave boys in the field. In 1876, Mr. Ives turned over his farm to his son, Frank E., and removed to Chelsea. He has been President of the village Trustees, and at present is President of the Chelsea Bank. Although having lived nearly three score and ten years, Mr. Ives still retains the full mental and physical vigor of his middle life, and bids fair to live yet many years to enjoy the mercies a bountiful Providence has so liberally bestowed on him. His present wife, Mrs. Mary A. (Duncan) Ives, is a lady of refinement and culture, and highly respected in the social circles of this county.

Rudolph Krause, farmer, sec. 18, Sylvan tp., P. O., Francisco; was born in Germany, April 20, 1836. His parents were Detrich and Ann Maria Krause, but the latter died when Mr. K. was quite young, and he has had to battle with the world alone, never realizing the warmth and tenderness of a mother's love. He was seized with a desire to come to America, and accordingly made preparations. He came to this country, and in 1854 to this county, where he has resided since. He was married in 1863 to Milliam Mana. They have 7 children, 5 boys and 2 girls. Mr. K. and wife are faithful members of the M. E. When he was 13 years of age he was apprenticed to a shoemaker, and worked at that trade until he was of age. He then came to America, first locating at Toronto, Canada, and subsequently at Buffalo, N. Y., where he followed his trade for some years. While a resident of this latter place his wife died suddenly of cholera, and his 4 children followed their mother to the dark valley within 24 hours time. The bereaved and heart-broken husband came to Chelsea, Mich., in 1853, where he had property, and was employed at his trade. In 1862 he bought 20 acres of land north of Chelsea, and by subsequent additions, increased the acreage to 86. Mr. Leach again married, and 9 children have been born to him—Thomas, Rebecca, Dennis, Walter, Alvin, Maggie, Springfield W., George B. and Robert. Willie is deceased.
